It was designed to connect the territory northwest of the Ohio with the Atlantic seaboard. The first appropriation was from the 2 per cent fund, which was reserved from the sale of public lands in Ohio for the express purpose of constructing roads leading to and through the new State. Between 1806 and 1834 it was constructed under national authority and by successive appropriations of Congress. As finally located, it led from Cumberland on the Potomac River to the Ohio River at Wheeling, and thence to Columbus. It was also extended through the capital of Indiana to the first capital of Illinois—Vandalia. The design was to carry it to the capital of Missouri, at Jefferson City. The same reservation of 2 per cent of the proceeds of public lands by the Federal Government for the building of roads was made in the cases of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri that had been made in Ohio. Thus those three States contributed to the road which was mainly constructed in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. The $7,000,000 which was put into the old national road was, I am free to say, the best investment of national money ever made. It paid the finest income, commercially, politically, and socially. It was the great highway of commerce and travel between the States of the Atlantic seaboard and the growing communities in the Mississippi Valley.

It increased the taxing power of the country. It furnished the necessary link between the two parts of the Nation, which prevented sectional hostility and disintegration.

Henry Clay said after the national road was completed he could reach Washington seven days sooner than it took him before. How long it took him before I do not know. If gentlemen will go to that beautiful Hermitage, near Nashville, they can see the old coach in which Andrew Jackson used to ride, it is said, between his home and Washington. It is said that Jackson could make the round trip in 28 days between Nashville and Washington over the old national pike road, and Jackson was considered a strenuous driver.

At the Mississippi River the Cumberland Road would have met the celebrated Boone's Lick Road, the first highway to penetrate the wilderness west of the great stream. In 1797, while Louisiana was still Spanish territory, Daniel Boone, under a concession from the Spanish governor, settled a small colony of Americans about 40 miles west of the Mississippi River in what is now Warren County, Mo. This was the first invasion of American settlers into the great trans-Mississippi territory. In 1804, the same year that the American Government took possession of upper Louisiana, Daniel Boone's two sons established themselves at a salt lick more than 100 miles to the westward. They were engaged in the manufacture of salt, which was floated down the Missouri River in rawhide canoes. The richness of the territory in which they were located attracted a large number of enterprising pioneers, mainly Kentuckians. The country became known as Boone's Lick country. It was in the heart of the great Louisiana territory, and the birthplace of many of the famous pioneers and explorers of the West.

In 1815 a roadway was surveyed and built from St. Charles, Mo., to Old Franklin, in the Boone's Lick country. This road was known as the Boone's Lick Road, and was the highway over which the advancing army of pioneers entered the territory beyond the Mississippi. As Boone's Lick was the farthest outpost of American civilization, it was often referred to in derision by Henry Clay. He was very fond of calling Thomas H. Benton "the statesman from Boone's Lick," although Benton was a man of education and culture and really lived in St. Louis. It was from the vigorous and enterprising community of Boone's Lick that the start was made to open up the commerce of the great Southwest. Capt. William Becknell started from that point in 1821 on what is now believed to be the first successful trip on a trading expedition to Santa Fe, N. Mex. As long as Mexico was under the rule of old Spain the policy of the rulers jealously excluded American traders and, in fact, looked upon all Americans as intruders and spies. A few Americans who found their way into Spanish territory prior to 1821 suffered imprisonment, oppression, and robbery. In 1821, however, Mexico successfully established her independence from Spain. This made possible the beginning of commercial intercourse between the two countries. The policy of Mexico was the reverse of that of Spain. She welcomed and encouraged the American traders, and even furnished them, as did our Government, with military aid as a protection against the Indians. Soon the puffing little steamboats began to come up to the great bend of the Missouri and the headquarters of the Santa Fe trade was moved westward to Independence, Mo. From thence onward for more than a quarter of a century, until New Mexico became American territory, this great historic highway, known as the Santa Fe Trail, led from the last outlying trading point in the Missouri Valley to the first great center of Spanish civilization in the Southwest. In 1824 Senator Benton had passed an act of Congress by which a survey was made of the Santa Fe Trail from Fort Osage, in Jackson County, Mo., to Santa Fe, N. Mex. I can not pause to give even briefly the history of that wonderful highway and its tremendous influence upon the destiny of the American Nation. It was the safety valve of those turbulent forces which are as common to the youth of nations as they are to the youth of man. It is one of the great historic highways of the world marking the progress of civilization.

Down the old trail went the huge Dearborn wagons loaded with fabrics and household necessities, and back came the bars of Mexican silver and the Spanish jacks and Mexican mules which have made Missouri famous in war and peace. All of the romance of the West clusters around this old trail. The names which adorn its history are those of the heroes of our boyish dreams. Many a pioneer lad of Missouri invested his little all in a stock of merchandise and made a trip across the plains to Santa Fe to seek his fortune and to establish himself in life as the young merchants of old made their ventures by ship to the Orient. The story of Dick Whittington, so poor in purse but large in hope and ambition, with his venture of his sole possession on the ship bound for China, which proved so successful that it made him thrice mayor of London, was repeated in large or small degree in the life of many a western youth of ante bellum days. So familiar had the trail become to the men of the West that when war was declared between the United States and Mexico in 1846 two regiments of Missouri volunteers marched down the old trail without maintaining a base of supplies and almost without orders or instructions. They seized the whole of New Mexico, invaded Chihuahua, and marched on to the conquest of California. More has been said of the daring of this expedition than of its military wisdom, but those who criticized it from the standpoint of military tactics overlooked the fact that every private in these Missouri troops knew the Santa Fe Trail as he knew the path from his father's cabin to the nearest mill. The Nation owes the ease and success of this great conquest of the West to the influence of the Santa Fe Trail in enlarging the vision of the western pioneer. Gen. Kearney, who commanded the expedition to New Mexico, led a fragment of his forces over the old Spanish trail to San Diego and thence up to the capitol of California at Monterey, and this formed the last link in the great transcontinental highway which planted the Stars and Stripes by the blue waters of the Pacific. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. What about the trail that runs from Dodge City to La Junta, and then, I presume, strikes out at Las Vegas?

Mr. BORLAND. The Santa Fe Trail originally ran by a place called Bents Fort, which was near the present La Junta; and when Senator Benton got the bill passed for the United States survey of the trail the survey was carried by Bents Fort. But to save time the traders cut across the desert south of the great bend of the Arkansas. It was a very dangerous place. They had to travel about 80 hours without water, and it was highly dangerous for a novice, but the experts were able to cross this way and to save about three and one-half days' time in getting into Santa Fe.

There is so much of interesting history about the trail that I would be very glad to give the gentleman a great deal more of it, but I am simply endeavoring at this time to arouse his interest in it.

A few years earlier than this the battle for Oregon had begun. Under our treaty of joint occupation with Great Britain, which had existed from 1819, the whole question finally resolved itself into which nation should have the most bona fide settlers on the ground when the last extension of the joint occupation terminated. It was a race for settlement. Great Britain had no highway across the frozen fields of Canada, and she must command the approach by sea. We had no highway across the Rocky Mountains from Missouri to Oregon, but once the American mind was inflamed with the need of saving the Oregon country we had the men who could make such a trail.

From Independence, Mo., the trappers and teamsters led the emigrants westward 40 miles and then struck boldly toward the Northwest across 2,000 miles of virgin wilderness. At the place where the Oregon Trail branched off from the Santa Fe Trail, a little west of the Missouri border, there appeared a single guidepost with the words "Road to Oregon" written thereon. It was in this offhand way that the immigrant was informed that 2,000 miles away, over the course of the Rockies, through the long deserts, and across the Sierras lay the wonderful empire of the lower Columbia.

In 1842 a thousand emigrants crossed from Independence to Oregon; in 1843, 2,000. In 1844 the Nation was aroused by the battle cry of "Fifty-four-forty or fight!" and before another year had rolled around Senator Benton had concluded his treaty with Great Britain, established the present line of Canada, and given us the three great States of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho. One length of the historical highway, therefore, represents the Oregon Trail and its connection from Portland to Puget Sound.

When we found the wealth that lay in California and the Argonauts or gold seekers started out on that trail from the Missouri River, dotting with their white bones their course across the desert, they went forward to Fort Hall and then down to San Francisco. Thus we had the gold-seekers' trail by which the fevered hosts invaded the State of California; and so, with the completion of the link up to Puget Sound, the Olympian Highway, we have the international highways which have marked the destiny of our country.

It is these international highways that the Daughters of the American Revolution have interested themselves in preserving. They are as sacred to us as battle fields. They record the steady triumph of peace. These trails were not built like the roads of ancient Rome or other empires, to bring in the revenue of distant and unwilling provinces. They were built in order that the torch of American civilization might be carried into the wilderness. [Applause.]

Only in rare instances did they resound to the tread of martial hosts; but day after day, year after year, was heard the music of the creaking wagon and the lowing ox. All of the mighty host who crossed these highways were armed not alone with the rifle but with the ax and spade. They took with them not the ammunition wagon and artillery, but herds of live stock and bales of household goods, implements of husbandry, and the women and children—the evidences and guaranties of a future State, the earnest of permanent settlement and the basis of an American home. [Applause.]

The long line was dotted with the cabins of the pioneers—the outposts of civilization. And ever as the stars came out in the blue depths of heaven above they looked down into the green expanse of prairies beneath and caught the faint spark that reflected back somewhat of their own heaven-born light. Each tiny spark in the sea of green marked the lighting of another hearth fire in an American home—another altar erected to country and to God. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BROWNE. The gentleman has made a very convincing argument from a sentimental standpoint, but I should like to ask him whether he thinks this road would accommodate as many people as other roads built with this national-aid money, and also how many States out of the 48 this Santa Fe trail would go through?

Mr. BORLAND. Now, I want to say to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE], if this were primarily a commercial proposition, his question would be more pertinent than it is. It would be a question of where the national highway should be built which would accommodate the largest number of people. I have hoped to approach it from a different standpoint, and to voice what I believe to be the sentiment of the organization behind this particular road. I want to say to the gentleman that there are no road engineers in the world like the Indian and the buffalo, and where the Indian and the buffalo have marked out the road is the cheapest, quickest, and best line of transportation. This road is the natural highway across the continent. It will be found by actual demonstration to contain fewer grades, shorter distances, and longer seasons for open travel than any other possible highway across the United States. I know what the gentleman has in mind. There are a large number of very influential and wealthy citizens along the Lincoln Highway. I am strongly for it. I wish we had a dozen or more great national highways. But if we had, in my judgment, that fact would in no way detract from the importance, the sacredness, and the beauty of these great highways which are really a part of the Nation's history.

I think that the travel by land, and especially in our own country, with all of its beauty, with all of its wealth, with all of its historic associations, is just in its infancy. I have little patience with those who go abroad to spend their time and money when they can see something always beautiful here. We are at the very threshold of becoming acquainted with our own country. I would not assume to tell to this body much of historical importance that is new, and yet I venture to say that much that I have said would be new to the average crowd in America. Yet it ought not to be. It ought to be understood by every schoolboy. It is only by giving the people an opportunity to see the great development of our land that that can be possible.

We have not begun to explore the historic and artistic possibilities of our own country, but we are on the very eve of the most tremendous international traffic and transcontinental travel that this Nation has ever seen. Motor travel is still in its infancy, but we already grasp something of its tendency. It means the linking together of town and country, of State and State, of coast and coast. It means the exploration of all the quaint corners and romantic spots of our land. It means that the wealth of beauty with which nature has endowed our great country shall be opened to the people; that the playgrounds of our national parks shall be brought to our doors; that we shall learn to know and love America first; and that our dower of health, wealth, and beauty shall enrich the life of our own people. Within the great confines of our country is to be found all of climate, natural grandeur, or scenic beauty to satisfy the most poetic and artistic taste. But better than all this is the fact that these old trails are milestones of heroism. Their history is so deeply embedded in our national life that we can take no view of our progress as a Nation which leaves them out of account. [Applause.]

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. EMERSON. Are the roads that the gentleman has traced on the map now in existence?

Mr. BORLAND. They are largely in existence, although not improved in a uniform way. How generally they are marked I can not say, with the very latest information. The National Road has been very generally marked and so has the Santa Fe Trail. As to the Oregon Trail I am not so sure, although our old friend, Ezra Meeker—probably a constituent of the gentleman from Wyoming, Mr. MONDELL—persists in driving his ox team over it once a year, and will, I suppose, until he drops in his tracks.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman from Missouri is mistaken. Mr. Meeker now travels in his automobile.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, I realize that my friend from Missouri travels in an automobile, but I was referring to another Mr. Meeker. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. No; I am referring to Ezra Meeker; he has thrown away his oxen and now travels in an automobile.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BORLAND. With pleasure.

Mr. MONDELL. The man that my friend refers to, Ezra Meeker, is not my constituent; he lives in the State of Washington and is a constituent of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]. Ezra Meeker traveled over the Oregon Trail among the very first travelers who passed over it; and in connection with what the gentleman from Missouri has just said in regard to the Oregon Trail I want to say that the Oregon Trail has been very well marked entirely across the State of Wyoming by an organization composed largely of the Daughters of the American Revolution. The trail is marked entirely across the State. I want to emphasize what the gentleman said a moment ago in regard to the wonderful accuracy with which these old trails were located over the lowest passes and through the most desirable section of the country.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is familiar with the South Pass.

Mr. MONDELL. The Oregon Trail across Wyoming is the shortest distance across the State, entirely on a water grade, and across the Rockies at the lowest pass in the entire Rocky Mountain chain within 500 miles; and, curiously enough, it is the only natural pass across the Rocky Mountains through which a railroad has never been built.

I did not have the pleasure of listening to the whole of the gentleman's address, but has the gentleman made any suggestion, or does he purpose to make any suggestion, relative to the method of raising the funds for the construction of these trails?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I will say that I have had for several sessions a bill pending in the House, H. R. 4755, which authorizes the Federal Government, after the trail has been constructed through a certain State, to reimburse the State for one-half of the cost of building it and making it a military highway.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I understood the gentleman to say that the Santa Fe trail west of Kansas City is well marked.

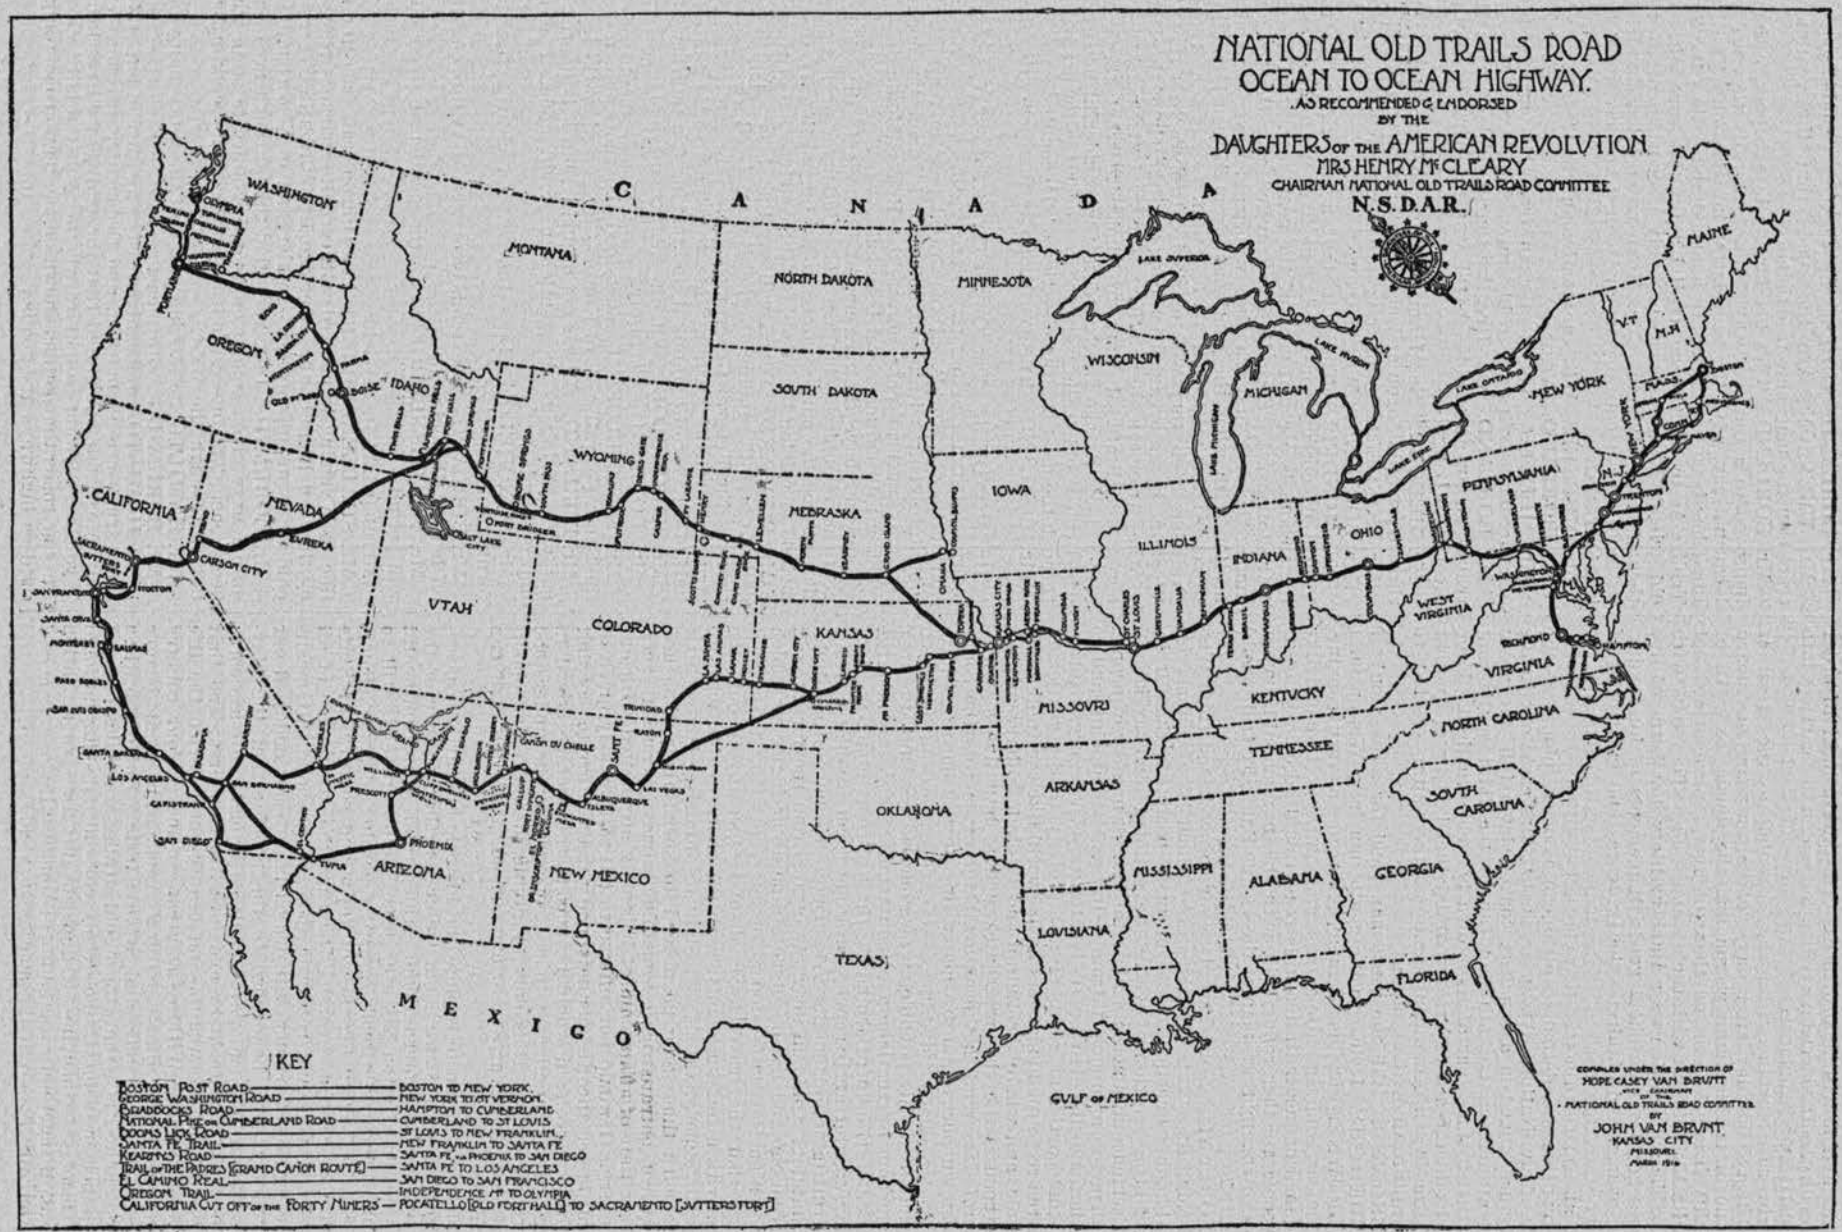
Mr. BORLAND. It was not orginally, but it is improved now, not with paving as the gentleman would understand modern improvements.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does that extend clear across to California?

Mr. BORLAND. It extends clear west to California, dropping off here at Phoenix.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman from Missouri will permit.

Mr. BORLAND. I yield.



Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Oregon trail from the Kansas line to Wyoming is marked with granite markers placed there by the Daughters of the American Revolution in Nebraska, and paid for by an appropriation by the State of Nebraska.

Mr. BORLAND. I am very glad that through my own ignorance I have given gentlemen an opportunity to state what has been done. The interest in it is widespread not only in Nebraska but all through the West.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. With pleasure.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman has stated that these trails are all marked, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has stated that the trail is well marked across Wyoming. I want to inquire whether substantially all of these lines or roads that he has shown on the map are now highways, used as highways and roads.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but, of course, of different widths and not always in the true location.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And some of them have not been improved?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but in some of them bridges and culverts are not in place, and much remains to be done.

Mr. KETTNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. With pleasure.

Mr. KETTNER. Is he aware that the State of California is at the present time building a concrete road from San Diego to Yuma, over the old trails, which is more than 50 per cent completed?

Mr. BORLAND. I am glad to have that information.

These trails have not come about by accident. They are the true index of the Nation's progress—the life history of a people. That they are linked in a complete chain from ocean to ocean is not a matter of chance, but each link represents an epoch in the growth of this Republic. They are the autograph of a nation written across the face of a continent. [Applause.]

The Boston Post Road united the infant Colonies; Braddocks Road led to the valley of the Ohio; the Cumberland Road saved to us the Southwest; the Southwest gave to us Louisiana Province, and the restless frontiersmen of that new domain gave us Texas and carried our flag to New Mexico, California, and Oregon.

All the skill of modern science has never been able to devise or discover within the confines of the United States better natural routes of transportation than these primitive old trails. On them the infant feet of the Nation have trod in its ambitious enterprise to grasp the full fruits of its opportunities.

The Revolution, which made us a Nation, gave us also the opportunity for the conquest of a continent and set before us the manifest destiny which should extend the feeble and struggling fringe of settlements upon the bleak Atlantic coast across 3,000 miles of virgin territory to the wondrous South Sea and bring it all under one flag, with one civilization, one language, one literature, and one law. [Applause.]

It is to the credit of the Daughters of the American Revolution that, true to the great historic inspiration of their body, they are devoting themselves to the preservation and perpetuation of these historic trails and that they have a right to expect to enlist the enthusiastic support of the Nation in this great purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN].

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, the high cost of living is a subject which, during the two years just past, has developed from a fruitful topic for the joke maker to one of the most serious questions that has ever confronted the people of this Nation. We can not readily name a single instance where the actual necessaries of life—food, fuel, clothing, light, and so forth—have not advanced in cost by leaps and bounds, until the average man feels that to live is beyond his means and to die is equally expensive.

Small wonder that under these conditions the thoughts of the people are concentrated on some possible effective remedy for the existing state of affairs, and it is equally easy to comprehend why in seeking for such an effective remedy many hysterical and ill-considered theories are advanced, the adoption of which would create an even more deplorable condition than now exists.

To this latter class belongs the proposed embargo on food supplies, advocated by a few worthy people, although chiefly by those who have not broadened their outlook sufficiently to consider or realize the disastrous consequences which would necessarily and quickly follow the adoption of such a measure.

Spasmodic and recurrent interest in the subject of embargoes on food products from one country to another, and even from one part of the same country to another part, has manifested itself from time to time since the first days of systematic agriculture and food production. The immediate effect of an embargo of any description is defined by Joseph Alden, in his Science of Government, in these words:

> An embargo forbids all ships and vessels from leaving any port in the country for any foreign port so long as the embargo continues.

About 120 years ago France and Great Britain, then at war with each other, made such unwarranted and unjust depredations on our vessels bound for foreign ports that in 1794 an embargo was established by our Government on exports to Great Britain and her colonies.

This embargo was intended as a retaliatory measure against the attacks of Great Britain on our neutral foreign commerce, but, like other embargoes which were made at various times in the two decades immediately following, this one proved ineffective and unsatisfactory, and served only to bring financial disaster on our domestic commerce. We have no reason to believe that an embargo on foodstuffs to-day would lead to any better results than were achieved by a like measure 120 years ago; indeed, owing to our greatly increased population, the probability is that the consequences of such action would be even more unfortunate than those of 1794.

The only power to levy an embargo on food products in times of peace rests with Congress. Such action may be taken by Congress at the solicitation of the people and approved by the President, or it may be taken at the request of the President and later approved by him. We know that a number of petitions have been received by the Members of this Congress requesting such an embargo, and we also know that many petitions and letters have been received protesting vehemently against such drastic and ill-favored legislation.

Consider for a moment who, if anyone, would be benefited by the proposed embargo and who would be injured thereby.

The only persons to profit, even temporarily, would be the speculators, and their profit would be short lived. At the same time, I think it is not too broad a statement to say that eventually all classes of people in this great Nation would suffer should this Congress allow itself to be overpersuaded or influenced to declare an embargo on foodstuffs; but the people who would receive the first, greatest, and longest enduring injury are the farmers of the country. Such action, therefore, in addition to its other objectionable features, may properly be termed class legislation aimed directly at the farmers of the United States and against their best interests. Anything which injures the farmers as a class injures the people at large, and whatever benefits the agricultural interests of the Nation reacts in favor of the whole country.

Many persons who do not favor an embargo on all foodstuffs welcome with joy the proposition to place an embargo on wheat, claiming that thereby the cost of bread to the consumer will be reduced. The chief argument of such theorists is that we have at present an unprecedented demand for wheat for export; that this export demand has caused the farmers to demand an exorbitant price for their wheat, hence, as the theorists claim, the resultant high price of a commodity which is literally the staff of life to thousands of people. They claim that if exports of wheat were stopped the farmers would be obliged to accept a lower price for their wheat and normal prices for bread would automatically follow. This argument sounds momentarily plausible, but it is not based on facts or truth.

It is true, however, that two years ago the American farmer received only 70 to 80 cents per bushel for his wheat. Equally true is it that on December 10, 1916, North Dakota wheat sold at $1.70 per bushel. But this price, while in round figures a dollar more than the farmer received two years ago, is not all clear profit to the farmer. We must not overlook the fact that in the two years just past other things than the price of food products have advanced. The farmer to-day is obliged to pay higher prices for his labor, lumber, twine, farm machinery, clothing, coal, lighting facilities; in fact, everything that the farmer uses, aside from what he can produce himself, has advanced in price.

The cost of production of a bushel of wheat having thus advanced rapidly, is it not just that the farmer should receive a higher price for his product? Why should the producer of the raw material, whose profit at best is merely nominal, be made the target for a species of class legislation which has not even the merit of serving to attain the object it seeks; that is, the reduction of the price of bread?

Mr. Chairman, the wheat grower is not the principal agent responsible for the high cost of bread to-day, nor is he the agent who makes the greatest profit on his product. One of the leading bakers in the District of Columbia made the statement to the Housekeepers' Alliance on December 9, 1916, that during the past two years the cost of operating a baking plant has increased 78 per cent. We all know to our sorrow that the price of bread has recently been increased 92 per cent, and yet this prominent baker mournfully declares that the "bakers are losing 14 per cent off their profits of two years ago." If, with an increase of 78 per cent in expenses and an advance of 92 per cent in the price received for their bread, the bakers are still losing 14 per cent off their profits of two years ago, it would be interesting to know what was considered a fair percentage of profit at that time. These are startling figures, and I expect to be met with the statement that I am mistaken; that the price of bread has only advanced from 5 to 6 cents per loaf. But it is a simple mathematical problem; that is, we now pay 6 cents for 10 ounces of bread, whereas we formerly paid 5 cents for 16 ounces of bread. The advance in price is, therefore, as I have just said, 92 per cent.

It has also been pointed out by one of the most prominent milling concerns in the United States that the housewife may reduce the cost of bread to her family 50 per cent if she does her own baking. This is of great interest, for if, under the necessity of buying her flour at retail and paying a proportionately higher price for fuel wherewith to do the baking, as well as paying other prices incidental to the work which are as much higher than the baker's as retail prices are higher than wholesale prices, if, with all these additional expenses the housewife can still reduce the price of her family's bread 50 per cent by baking it herself, what must be the percentage of profit made by the baker from whom she buys her bread?

The flour should cost the baker or housewife but very little more than the farmer receives for his wheat, since the by-products of the wheat are generally understood to cover nearly, if not all, the entire cost of milling and transportation.

The Department of Agriculture is authority for the stated proportion between wheat flour and the amount of bread made therefrom. The department states:

The experiments of the Office of Home Economics have to do with household methods, and in bread-making tests we have as yet had opportunity only to consider the usual flours known as "bread flours," which are probably blends. We get about 1½ pounds of bread from a pound of flour by household methods. The Bureau of Chemistry states that commercial reports published by bakers estimate that with modern methods, which involve more or less fat and sugar, 325 pound loaves (before baking) can be obtained from a barrel of hard-wheat flour, and 300 pound loaves (before baking) from a barrel of soft-wheat flour. During baking each loaf loses about 1½ ounces in weight. These are average values for both sorts of flour, and flours vary somewhat in the amount of water which they will take up and retain.

The best grade of flour used by the baker to-day costs the baker in the District of Columbia not to exceed $8.50 per barrel of 196 pounds, which, according to various recent tests, will produce 470 loaves of bread of the size now sold as standard loaves. This allows for evaporation in baking. These loaves weigh 10 ounces each, and retail at 6 cents per loaf, thus making one barrel of flour cost the consumer $28.20.

At the extreme market price for the best wheat to-day the farmer receives $1.70 per bushel for his wheat. I may add that since these figures were obtained the price of wheat has dropped, and proportionally the price of flour, yet the price of bread is steadily maintained, and does not, as might be expected, follow the downward trend of wheat and flour. This makes the extreme price to the farmer for a quantity of wheat sufficient to make a barrel of flour, or 4½ bushels, only $7.65. The total spread, therefore, between the farmer and the ultimate consumer equals the difference between the $7.65 received by the farmer and the $28.20 which the consumer pays, a difference of $20.55 per barrel. This, it seems to me, is sufficient evidence to prove that the present high cost of bread is not due to our export trade, nor to any exorbitant price received by the farmer for his wheat, but to an artificial inflation of the spread between the farmer's receipts and the ultimate consumer's outlay. It is clear, therefore, that the responsibility for the high price of this particular commodity can not be charged to the wheat grower, but must be placed to the credit—or discredit—of the speculator and middleman. One of these middlemen, and the one who, in my opinion, seems to be the guilty culprit, is the public baker. For instance, as I have already stated, the baker in the District of Columbia pays not to exceed $8.50 per barrel for the best grade of flour which he uses. This is only 85 cents per barrel more than the farmer receives for a quantity of wheat sufficient to make that barrel of flour, therefore the spread between the time the wheat leaves the farmer and is delivered to the baker in the shape of flour is not abnormally great. Now, let us see how that same barrel of flour increases in price in the baker's hands. With due allowance for evaporation, that barrel of flour, which costs the baker, say, $8.50, is made into 470 loaves of bread weighing 10 ounces each, which are sold to the consumer at 6 cents per loaf, thus bringing the cost of the barrel of flour for which the baker paid only $8.50 up to $28.20 to the consumer.

The spread in price, therefore, on a barrel of flour from the time it comes into the baker's hands until it goes from him to the consumer amounts to the difference between $8.50 and $28.20, or $19.70, a gain of more than 230 per cent. Therefore it is not the farmer—whose price, though higher than usual, is not unreasonable—nor the grocer—whose profit is also small—but the bakers who are responsible for the high price of bread to-day. Abolish the speculative element in marketing food products and the exorbitant profits of the middleman—in this case the baker—and the prime cause of high prices is removed.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. Has the gentleman investigated the price of bread abroad?

Mr. HELGESEN. I come to that a little later. I have not investigated it as thoroughly as the gentleman indicated in his speech he had.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman spoke about the exorbitant profits that the baker who pays $8.50 a barrel for flour and retails four hundred-odd loaves, which he makes out of that barrel of flour for $28?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What does it cost the baker to make those 400 loaves of bread? What is the net profit?

Mr. HELGESEN. I do not know what it costs; but I want to put the bakers upon the defensive and have them show to the people that it actually costs them $20 to bake a barrel of flour and distribute it. I do not believe that they can make any such showing. They have never attempted it in the past and I do not believe they can now.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Outside of the labor charge, which goes into the making of the bread, and the flour, what other elements enter into the cost of the bread?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yeast, salt, and occasionally a little shortening, but not a great deal.

Mr. TILSON. And the gentleman thinks that those elements do not cost a sufficient amount to add materially to the cost?

Mr. HELGESEN. Not materially.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. Has the gentleman investigated the efforts of the National Association of Bakers to increase the price of bread, the circulars they are sending out at the present time, and the assessments they are levying upon their members in various sections of the country, so as to pay expenses of a nation-wide publicity campaign to convince the American public that bread ought to be 6 cents a loaf?

Mr. HELGESEN. I have not investigated that particular thing, but I know there is such a propaganda before us.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. Has the gentleman made any investigation as to whether or not the bakers in recent times have increased their charges out of proportion to what they used to do formerly?

Mr. HELGESEN. I have, yes; and I will come to that a little bit later.

Some time before the outbreak of the European war the statement was made by Mr. J. R. Cahill, official investigator for the Board of Trade of England, that he did not understand how his people in England could buy bread in London for one-third the price that Chicago consumers paid when the English bread was made from American wheat. Mr. Cahill added:

You pay 5 cents for 14 ounces of bread, while we get a loaf weighing 64 ounces for 10 cents, made out of your own wheat. Our 4-pound loaf never costs more than 12 cents, and usually only 10 cents.

Thus, according to this English investigator, we were paying twice as much for our bread in times of peace as the English people paid for theirs, while both were made from American wheat; and even now, when England is undergoing the stringency of so-called "war prices," the same proportion holds good, for while England has recently advanced the price of bread to 4½ cents per pound, thereby nearly causing a bread riot, we are obliged to pay 9⅜ cents per pound, or a little more than double the price of the same quantity in England.

This is unquestionably an injustice to the American consumer, but it also proves that the price that the farmer receives for his wheat has nothing to do with the high price of bread, since both English and American bread are made from American wheat, and English people are now in time of war eating bread at a lower price to the consumer than we were forced to pay at a time when peace prevailed throughout the civilized world.

Therefore I ask why select the farmer as the victim of an attempt to reduce the price of bread by placing an embargo on shipments of his products to markets which were open to our wheat surplus for years before the European war? Official figures show that during the first nine months of 1915, a war period, exports of farm products increased about 122 per cent over the preceding year and showed about the same percentage increase for the first nine months of 1916, while on the other hand exports of manufactured articles have increased about 260 per cent. Why should the farmer alone bear the burden of an embargo, when the exports of the products of our factories have increased twice as much as the exports of farm products, and when those same manufactured products have also advanced in price to the American farmers and other consumers to an alarming extent?

Mr. Frank Andrews, a leading statistician in the United States Department of Agriculture, in commenting on the price of wheat at the present time, said that we may eliminate as factors the European war, the drought in Argentina, the decrease of acreage in the Australian States, the estimated reduction in the Canadian crop, and still find a sufficient reason for the unusual price of wheat in the fact that where we harvested 10 bushels in 1915 we harvested only 6 bushels in 1916.

The National Grange, than whom no more intelligent class of people exists in this broad land, at its meeting in this city in November, 1916, after careful consideration and wide discussion of the subject, declared that the higher prices of farm products are due principally to poor crops in certain sections, and to the greatly increased cost of those things which the farmer is obliged to buy. The organization officially protested against embargoes on food products and declared that if any embargoes are to be placed they should be on manufactured products, particularly on munitions of war.

A proposition to place an embargo on arms and munitions of war would immediately meet with a howl of protest from the largest manufacturing concerns in the United States to-day, as well as from the immense iron and steel interests which control the output of those industries. But it is manifestly no more unjust to place an embargo on the product of our great iron, steel, and munition factories than it is to restrict in a like manner the sale of the raw material produced by the man on whose shoulders, more than on any other, rests the welfare of the Nation—the farmer.

The proposed embargo is not acknowledged by its promoters to be in any sense a retaliatory measure, but the claim is made that it looks objectively to the conservation of food supplies in this country, with the erroneous idea that thereby with an increased home supply for home consumption prices would at once decline. Such a result, however, would be only temporary and would not strike at the root of the evil. To use a farmer's illustration, it is like trying to eradicate the plant pest known as the wild morning-glory by merely plucking its blossoms, while its roots are left to thrust their octopuslike and destructive branches underground in every direction. Furthermore, no legislative act could be more productive of foreign complications than such an embargo.

We proclaim ourselves a neutral Nation, and proudly declare that our neutrality must be preserved at whatever cost. Yet an embargo on food products to foreign countries at war with each other would be not only a grossly unneutral act but an inhumane one as well. In times past we have sent relief ships loaded with foodstuffs and clothing to suffering Belgium; we have opened our pocketbooks and our granaries to starving China and Russia in times of famine; we have done our share to alleviate the hunger and misery of plague-stricken India; how, then, can we consistently continue to send agents of death in the shape of arms and munitions of war to nations engaged in the most terrible struggle of the ages—whether or not we believe the cause of either belligerent to be a righteous one—and at the same time deny the women and children of those struggling nations the means to sustain life? Is this our boasted civilization? Is this greedy, self-centered policy the vaunted light with which our liberty illumines the world? All other considerations for the moment aside at a time when we alone of all the great nations of the world are at peace, we can not take such action as would be contrary to that great destiny of our country which our forefathers saw as in a vision and which we as a Nation have endeavored to realize.

If we are not influenced by humanitarian principles—which, however, I am loath to admit—we ought to consider questions of policy. Some of the advocates of an embargo claim that the embargo on food products should be imposed for purely domestic reasons. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that "for purely domestic reasons," if for no other, we should refrain from placing such an embargo. If it is imposed, it will be considered as a distinctly unfriendly act by some of the warring factions of Europe, and will be an open invitation to reprisal of a drastic and expensive nature on the part of those factions. This statement is not made as an attempt to frighten the people of this Nation with an imaginary bogy, for we should find that such reprisal would materialize into practical and tangible methods with which we are not at present prepared to cope. Under such conditions not a vessel could leave our Atlantic ports if Great Britain desired to prevent it. Not a ship could sail along our coasts if the power that rules the seas decided otherwise. Are we ready to uphold our embargo by force? Are we not courting trouble at a time when we should be doing all in our power to maintain peace? No one can deplore the high cost of the necessities of life more than I, yet I am still of the opinion that it is better to pay our present exorbitant prices for bread and other commodities were it necessary to do so than to unnecessarily bring on ourselves the retaliative measures of a country or countries driven mad by hunger and desperation.

Furthermore, we do not live for the moment alone. We must consider the future. When the war is over—and it must end some time—prices will seek their normal level. If an embargo on wheat and other food products is imposed, we should then have on our hands not only the normal surplus with which we always have to reckon, but, in addition, an abnormal surplus caused by our voluntary closing of the markets of the world to our products at prevailing prices.

We may argue that an embargo would lead to a lessening of wheat production for a season, thus maintaining a normal supply. This, too, is a specious argument, for if the wheat-growing area of the country is greatly reduced, as it is sure to be in case of an embargo on wheat, we shall be brought face to face with the very condition which we claim to be striving to avoid, namely, a shortage of supply and consequent high prices. Why is it better to pay high prices because of an actual shortage than to pay high prices when the supply is abundant and we are receiving high prices as well as paying them?

An embargo on wheat means that we can not send our wheat out of the country. It also means that a proportionately smaller amount of money will come into this country and be placed in circulation, to the ultimate disadvantage of all the people of the Nation.

But at this time statistics show that no present or imminent shortage of wheat exists in the United States. There is an old saying that "Figures don't lie, but liars use figures"; nevertheless I wish to present a few figures for your consideration. At the beginning of the present crop year we are reported to have had 150,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat carried over from the crop of the preceding year. These figures may be too small, but they are unquestionably not overestimated. The Bureau of Statistics of our Department of Agriculture has estimated the wheat crop of the present year at 607,000,000 bushels, and we know from past records and experience that these figures also are conservative to a high degree. Assuming, however, that they are correct, we had a total available supply of 757,000,000 bushels of wheat of which to dispose. Our own requirements for seed and for home consumption are estimated by the Department of Agriculture to be not over 625,000,000 bushels. This left us a net surplus of 143,000,000 bushels of wheat to export, without inflicting hardship or shortage on the people of our own country. Some of this has, of course, been exported.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman state how much?

Mr. HELGESEN. I could not tell the gentleman exactly, because the figures seem to differ, but there is still a large surplus to export.

Mr. FARR. How much a week are we exporting now?

Mr. HELGESEN. I do not know.

Mr. FARR. I understand it is a million bushels a day.

Mr. HELGESEN. It would be manifestly unjust, unfair, and un-American to force our own producers to hold the balance of this surplus of 143,000,000 bushels of wheat in American storehouses, when they could receive a fair price for it in the markets of the world, merely for the purpose of attempting to force the price of bread lower than it is to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELGESEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Sometime during December I was waited upon by a gentleman, whose name I do not recall, who said he represented the National Association of Bakers, if that is the name of the association. He said to me positively—he said that he knew, and, of course, I do not say that he did—that all of the wheat in the country would be exhausted by the end of February unless we forbade the exportation of wheat. Is that correct?

Mr. HELGESEN. Well, we know that, according to the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Commerce, it has not been exhausted. Whether it will be or not, of course, I could not say.

Mr. MANN. I thought I could, and I did say, but I wondered whether I was correct.

Mr. HELGESEN. But I made an investigation recently here in the city, and I find they are selling loaves of bread now at 5 cents that weigh 12 ounces, and they are selling loaves of bread at 6 cents that weigh 8 ounces and 10 ounces. I found one baker who said that when wheat was rapidly going up in price and flour following he secured and purchased 1,000 barrels of flour, at $11 a barrel. Wheat began to drop, and flour dropped in proportion until it is only about $8.50 a barrel at the present time. He said, "I am making bread out of the $11-a-barrel flour, which is $2.50 more than I could buy it for now, and I am still selling 12 ounces of bread for 5 cents." How can he do that on $11 flour if the others can not make it out of $8.50 flour? It is not the price of flour. It is the arbitrary price put upon bread by the bakers, and that price is not uniform, because in this very city to-day they are selling different-sized loaves at different prices, and if they were all forced by the price of flour to raise the price of their bread, it would be pretty apt to be somewhat uniform.

If such a means would accomplish the desired result, the arguments in favor of an embargo measure might have some weight, but while large quantities of grain and other food products are held by speculators, an embargo on wheat or on any other article of food might cause a temporary slump in prices to the consumer, but it would work untold hardship to the farmer. The speculator, or, to speak more plainly and forcibly, the gambler in food products, and the middlemen, not the farmer, are responsible for the high cost of food. Since the first corner in wheat was established in Egypt nearly 4,000 years ago by one Joseph, who gathered corn as the sand of the sea and thriftily stored it away in Pharaoh's granaries, until all countries came into Egypt to buy corn, down to the present time when the great manipulators of Chicago and New York regulate the stock tickers to suit their own ends, the speculator has been the bane of normal prices and reasonable profits.

Again, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, it is not only the price of wheat and the price of bread that have advanced. Almost every article of consumption that we can name has shown an advance, in some instances even proportionately greater than the increase in the price of wheat.

I shall insert herewith a table showing the prices which the farmer received in 1913 on a few staple commodities and the prices which he receives on those same commodities to-day; also the prices which the consumer paid in 1913 and the prices which the consumer pays to-day on the same commodities:

Prices the farmer received and the consumer paid in 1913.

Commodity.	Price the farmer received.	Price the consumer paid.
	Per bushel.	Per bushel.
Potatoes	$0.25	$1.00
Onions (red)	.50	2.00
Turnips	.25	1.60
Beans	2.10	3.20

Prices the farmer received and the consumer paid in 1916.

Commodity.	Price the farmer received.	Price the consumer paid.
	Per bushel.	Per bushel.
Potatoes	$1.24	$1.60
Onions (red)	1.35	4.00
Turnips	.50	1.60
Beans	4.80	11.20

In 1914 cotton prices were so low that American planters appealed for aid to the Government, and received it. At the present time cotton is higher than ever before, and if it continues to soar we shall be obliged to wear silk, because cotton will be too much of a luxury for anyone but a plutocrat. No doubt speculative influences help to force cotton values far above the basis warranted by the law of supply and demand; yet, nothwithstanding the fact that the necessity of people for clothing is second only to the necessity for food, a large proportion of our present exports of cotton are eventually used for the manufacture of guncotton and similar war munitions instead of for clothing, while the wheat that we export is used to make bread for the people in those war-ridden countries, who can not live without food either in time of strife or peace.

Shoe manufacturers have recently made the tentative suggestion that an embargo be placed on leather in order to reduce the price of shoes, which in some instances are 50 per cent higher than two years ago. This would be just about as consistent an act as that of the Democrats when they placed hides on the free list in order to bring the price of shoes in reach of the poorest man.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from North Dakota yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HELGESEN. I will.

Mr. RAINEY. I would call his attention to the fact that the Democrats did not do that. It was done in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. HELGESEN. It was done in the Payne-Aldrich bill?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; the Republicans did that.

Mr. HELGESEN. Then my friend Bryan is wrong, and that was one time when the Republicans yielded to the Democrats and to Democratic doctrines. The result was a failure.

An illustration of the remarkable inconsistency of the arguments used by our Democratic friends to sustain their position was shown in a speech recently made by William Jennings Bryan at Grand Forks, N. Dak. Mr. Bryan said that when it was proposed to place hides on the free list a protest was made against such action on the ground that it would render our domestic hides practically valueless in competition with foreign hides. Mr. Bryan added with great gusto and emphasis that instead of reducing the value of domestic hides the hide was worth more to-day than the whole steer was before the tariff was removed. He failed to state or recall, however, that the prime object in placing hides on the free list was to reduce the price of shoes to the poor man, who now has to pay nearly double what he formerly paid for a pair of shoes. The remedy applied at that time to reduce the price of shoes was a failure; but the placing of an embargo on wheat to reduce the price of bread would prove a greater failure.

Carpenters and builders have also suggested the feasibility of an embargo on lumber in order to lessen the cost of houses and other buildings. Under modern conditions a bed is considered a necessity, and some of the bedding manufacturers feel that they should be protected by an embargo on their raw materials. The farmer is of the opinion that if an embargo is due anywhere, it should not be on his products, but on farm implements and farm machinery, by the use of which he is enabled to raise his products, and on munitions of war. Such an embargo would give the farmer more and cheaper laborers and would tend to reduce the cost of his production; and if cheap wheat is wanted, that is one way to get it. In fact, every argument that can be brought forth in favor of an embargo on food applies with equal force to other articles of commerce, including arms and munitions of war. The only consistent position which we can adopt, therefore, on the favorable consideration of an embargo will lead us to say that no article of commerce shall leave the shores of America to go to any foreign country. An embargo on any one article or class of articles is gross discrimination against the producers of that article.

I may add that while the city dweller has to pay an increased price for most of the articles which he buys, the wages and salaries of the workers in the city have in most instances made a reasonable advance in the last decade, so that the city dweller does not feel the high cost of living as stringently as might be imagined. Not so with the farmer. Not only have his expenses of production increased, but the price to him of every article which he is obliged to purchase has likewise advanced. He is therefore the loser at both ends of the line. Furthermore, the price which the farmer now receives for his wheat is only temporary, while the increased wages of the city dwellers are to a large extent permanent, so that while the farmer who was able to harvest a crop this year may seem to reap an advantage, that advantage is only for this year, or possibly next year, or, at the most, until the war closes, when his commodities will drop back to their former level, while his city brother continues to receive his advanced wages. Therefore, instead of placing on the farmer the added burden of an embargo on his wheat, we should look for a means to alleviate the difficult situation which he, more than any other man in the country, is obliged to face.

Our present methods of distribution can not be laid at the farmer's door any more than can the necessity for storage facilities caused by the ever-increasing tendency of city people to buy in small quantities and live from hand to mouth, instead of pursuing the more liberal policy of purchasing in larger quantities which was possible a generation or more ago.

An embargo of any kind is a restriction of commerce, a restriction of commerce is a restriction of production, and a restriction of production means unemployment for many and low wages for those who are employed.

Economists and others who have studied the situation agree that our present export trade of some $5,000,000,000 a year, due to the European war, is the only source of even the artificial prosperity which we experience under the present administration. Reduce this export trade by an embargo, and we immediately curtail the purchasing ability of our people, retrenchment of expenses ensues, and consequent ruin to such commerce as we now possess.

Briefly to sum up the matter: The proposed embargo measures should be dropped. We can not reduce the high cost of living by one embargo or by many. If one embargo is levied, others must be, and such action could result only in disaster.

When the farmer receives only $1.70 per bushel for his wheat, and that in a year of small crops and high cost of production, when that moderate price which the farmer receives is increased more than 230 per cent before a loaf of bread reaches the ultimate consumer, it is, I repeat, manifestly unjust and unfair to cripple the energy and activity of the American farmer by ill-timed and short-sighted legislation. Give him a square deal and an equal chance with other producers of the Nation; eliminate the immense and unwarranted profits of the gamblers and middlemen who practice their nefarious manipulations between the farmer and the consumer, and the farmer will continue in the future, as he has done in the past, to produce sufficient food for our own Nation and do his glorious share toward feeding the people of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire at this time to say a few words about the cotton situation in the United States. The cotton crop of 1916 will be 750,000 bales short of the 1915 crop. We have already exported 900,000 bales more than we exported up to this time a year ago. The cotton mills of the United States have consumed in the last 12 months 7,000,000 bales. This year our cotton mills will consume 7,000,000, and maybe 7,500,000, bales. It is safe to say that we will need 7,500,000 bales of this crop for spindles in the United States and 7,000,000 for the spinners abroad, making the demand about 14,500,000 or 15,000,000 bales. We have a crop of less than 11,500,000 bales to draw that supply from. You can readily see, Mr. Chairman, that cotton is going to be very scarce before the summer comes. Cotton will be selling for 20 cents a pound in the next few weeks; maybe 22 or 23 cents by the 4th of July.

As soon as the spinners of the United States realize that many farmers in the boll-weevil sections of the South are simply abandoning all efforts to produce cotton under boll-weevil conditions, they will wake up to the fact that this year they are going to be confronted with a cotton crop of less than 10,000,000 bales. Germany is buying cotton here now and storing it in the United States. It is believed by many that the war will come to an end in the summer of this year, and if it does gentlemen need not be surprised to see cotton selling for 30 cents a pound. [Applause.]

I remember reading about what happened regarding cotton when the War between the States was over. My father sold cotton for 50 cents a pound, and the highest price, I believe, paid for cotton following that war was $1.26 a pound. It is true that cotton and wool, silk and linen, all have brought high prices following the wars of the past. My reason for saying that cotton will go to more than 30 cents per pound when the war is ended is based upon this idea: Austria and Germany have their mills intact. They are not injured—just idle now—but ready to run when the war is over. As soon as the war is over Germany and Austria are coming into the market for a considerable part of our cotton crop. They consumed at the time the war commenced annually 3,000,000 bales of American cotton. Now, Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will just add that demand to the present demand of 14,000,000 bales of cotton produced in the United States, they will have an interesting situation. [Applause.] In 1917, with a demand for 17,000,000 bales and a crop of less than 10,000,000 bales to meet it, you are bound to see cotton prices go higher. Cotton of the Egyptian variety grown in Arizona is now selling for 48 and 50 cents a pound, and, in view of the high price now paid for this character of long-staple cotton, 24 and 25 cents a pound is not too high for the average grade produced in the United States. [Applause.]

Finished wool is now selling at $1 a pound, and the wool supply is nearly exhausted. Do you wonder that cotton has sold for 21 cents, when long-staple cotton of the Egyptian variety is selling for 48 and 50 cents and wool at $1 a pound. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in the boll-weevil sections of Alabama the cotton crop of 1916 was a failure. Counties that used to make 30,000 bales annually made less than 5,000 bales last year.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. FESS. What success are they having in eradicating the boll weevil?

Mr. HEFLIN. So far nothing has been discovered that destroys the boll weevil, but the Department of Agriculture has found that by certain cultural methods you can produce some cotton under boll-weevil conditions. This is done by using an early variety of seed, planting early, and cultivating rapidly.

If we have wet weather in the cotton belt during the months of July and August, it is exceedingly difficult to produce any cotton in the boll-weevil section. A great many of our farmers are producing velvet beans, peanuts, hay, peas, alfalfa, and crops of that character. The coming of the boll weevil may, in the long run, be a blessing to the South. His coming has certainly caused our farmers to turn their attention to farming of another character. For the next year or two, at least, the cotton crop is going to be very short, and many farmers are going to be embarrassed before they get adjusted to the new conditions. The boll weevil is spreading rapidly and he will be in new territory this year, and the farmer who produced cotton last year may not be able to produce any this year, but there is one thing certain, if he will hold on to the cotton that he now has he will get a good price for it. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I regret to see the disposition on the part of certain eastern and New England interests to place an embargo on cotton. [Applause.] The cotton farmers of the United States suffered greatly on account of destructive prices in 1914 and these concerns offered no aid or sympathy then. The situation is changed now, and they want to pass a law to deprive the farmer of fair prices and place him at their mercy, and I am opposed to it. [Applause.]

If the spinners of the United States want cotton, let them go into the market and buy it, and let the farmer get the benefit of the profit that he is entitled to. [Applause.] If Congress would not pass an act in 1914 to protect cotton farmers from destructive prices caused by conditions created by war, under what principle of justice and fair play would Congress now pass an act to prevent the shipment of cotton to foreign countries and thus place the producers of the United States at the mercy of speculators and spinners? [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Will my friend yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. TILSON. For some years we have been appropriating money for the destruction of the boll weevil. Will the gentleman state very briefly just what progress is being made in the eradication of this pest, and what we could do about it if we were inclined, as I think Congress has shown it is right along, to help further toward the destruction of this fearful pest?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have already touched upon that. I prefer to use the time allotted to me in a further discussion of the cotton supply and demand. I want the people of the United States who need cotton to realize the necessity of going into the market now and buying their supply, for, in my judgment, they are not going to succeed in getting Congress to reduce the price. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. A word about the boll weevil. We have learned to shift our cotton to the other side of the field, and where he hibernates in the root bottoms we leave him to eat weeds instead of cotton. However, the farmer has learned this, That you can not freeze him out except when he is in the embryonic stage. When he is full grown and in shape he will go into hibernation. You can "cook him up" in the ice, and then thaw him out like a fish in the Klondike region. But he will wiggle next spring when the insects wake up. We are trying to trace him back and get his ancestry and find where he generates in his ancestry, as they do in the case of the grasshopper. They deal with the grasshopper by killing his grandfather before he comes. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; for one question.

Mr. FESS. We are making pretty large appropriations for the eradication of the boll weevil. Are we justified in them?

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FESS. We are getting somewhere?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly, and we must keep up the fight until we do discover something that will destroy him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood the gentleman to say that there will not be as much cotton raised this year as was raised in former years. To what does the gentleman attribute that? The increase of price would seem to warrant a larger crop.

Mr. HEFLIN. As I have said, the cotton crop this year will be small because of the presence of the boll weevil in the Carolinas, Georgia, and Alabama.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The decrease has been on account of the boll weevil?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; the tremendous decrease has been caused by the boll weevil.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss another situation in the cotton belt. We have tried to regulate the cotton exchanges so that real cotton and not fictitious stuff would be the real power behind all transactions on the exchanges and the present law. The one that I helped to frame and pass is the best law ever written on the subject. [Applause.] It is not perfect, but it is a great improvement over the old law written by the agents of the exchange. [Applause.] But, Mr. Chairman, another evil in the cotton trade has come to my attention. This one is not carried on in the exchange but it is rather an exchange "aid society" operating in the spot markets of the South. Certain cotton spinners in the United States and representatives of foreign spinners, it is charged, have entered into an agreement to divide out the territory in the South into counties and districts, and that the agent or buyer of one concern will not bid for or buy any cotton in the territory of the other.

It is high time that the farmer, the merchant, and the banker should stand together in concerted action demanding a fair price for cotton. They should hold and refuse to sell until the price is satisfactory. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. Has the cotton farmer of the South been getting the whole benefit of the high price of cotton recently?

Mr. HEFLIN. He did not in 1915; but in 1916 a great many of the farmers sold their cotton for 18, 19, and some for 20 cents a pound. But it is true that the great bulk of the crop has passed out of the hands of the farmer.

Mr. REILLY. Another question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. If the price of cotton will go to 25 cents a pound, as the gentleman suggests, will the farmer get the benefit of it?

Mr. HEFLIN. No. The bulk of the crop is out of the hands of the farmer. A great many merchants in the South have the cotton, and they will hold it, because they are able to do it.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that Congress would be guilty of a crime against the cotton producers of the United States if it should place an embargo against cotton. [Applause,]

In 1914, when we were here pleading for relief of cotton farmers, when cotton values were destroyed by conditions created by a foreign war, certain eastern Congressmen sat here and looked wise and said it was a situation over which they had no control and that we would have to grin and endure it. Now we can say to these same gentlemen that this situation was created by the war and the boll weevil. It is, as you said in 1914, a situation over which Congress has no control and you will just have to grin and endure it. [Applause.]

The increasing demand for cotton and the small supply of cotton have caused good prices to obtain this season, and I appeal for fair play and competitive buying. This is all that we ask, and common justice demands that we have it. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

[Mr. REILLY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, coming from the chief seaport of the United States, I assume that I may be pardoned for making a few observations on the Shipping Board appointed recently by the President under an act passed by us at the last session, and with particular reference to the personnel of the board.

William Denman, of San Francisco, appointed for six years, is, so far as I can discover, and it is the fact, an admiralty lawyer of ability, and that particular appointment is not subject to reasonable criticism.

James B. White, of Kansas City, Mo., is a lumber merchant of that large and growing and important city, and outside of the fact that a member of the Shipping Board, which, presumably, has to do with ships, ought possibly to have some knowledge of ships, I do not know that there is any criticism that can be passed on Mr. White. I understand that he is a man of standing, reputation, and ability.

The remaining three men are the ones that have to do with ships, and I want to call the attention of the House to what the President has done so far as the men that know anything about ships are concerned. The purpose of the United States Shipping Board is supposed to be to build up the United States shipping industry. Who is and always will be our greatest competitor? Why, Great Britain. What has been the experience of Bernard N. Baker and John A. Donald and Theodore Brent?

John A. Donald, born in Glasgow, removed to this country after he came to mature years, has been, and still is, president of a British steamship line, the Donald Line.

Bernard N. Baker was at the date of his retirement from activity in the steamship business president of the Atlantic Transport Co., another British line, and Theodore Brent is a former employee of Bernard N. Baker in the steamship business.

So we have appointed to a board which is to control $50,000,000 men whose affiliations are entirely British. I have good friends connected with the shipping industry. I have good friends connected with the French lines, I have good friends connected with the German lines, but I say very frankly that if the control of this shipping board had been turned over to the representatives of the French line, or the Fabre line, or to the Hamburg-American, or the North German Lloyd Co. I should have felt that the outrage to the country was of the same character, though possibly less in degree, because our competition is more greatly with Great Britain. Now, what is there in addition about John A. Donald? I was not here in the Sixty-third Congress, I think it was, when they passed the shipping bill, but I understand that bill provides a literacy test for seamen, and that the purpose was to take the Chinese and other foreigners who could not speak the English language off our ships. John A. Donald is the greatest representative of the opposite view who runs ships in and out of New York Harbor. On every one of his seven ships every possible place that can be filled by a Chinaman is filled by a Chinaman. Further than that, the British have a literacy test in their law somewhat along the same lines as ours, with this exception, that it shall not apply to subjects of Great Britain. Therefore every man on John A. Donald's seven ships, every Chinaman, has to certify that he is a native of the island of Hongkong. Mr. Chairman, it is a polite fiction, and John A. Donald is not only running British ships manned by Chinamen, but unquestionably British ships manned by Chinamen who are on the British ships in violation of British law.

That is not all of John A. Donald. This is not his first connection with the United States Government. When I was in Congress before, the attention of Representative J. Van Vechten Olcott and myself was called to a peculiar condition in the Navy Department. On the bottom of every big ship that sails the salt seas there is put what is known as antifouling composition paint. It is expensive, but a necessary paint.

There were two rules in the Navy Department that deserved more than passing attention we thought. One was that only two companies could be admitted into the competition for antifouling composition paint. One was the Holzapfel Co. and the other was the Rathjen, both of foreign origin, although, I think, having ancillary American incorporation. The other rule, without parallel in any department, was that once a bottom was painted with Holzapfel or Rathjen paint, thereafter, so long as that ship remained in the Navy list, it should be painted with Holzapfel or Rathjen paint. Mr. Olcott and I thought those two rules had a slimy suggestion of graft. We went to the then Secretary of the Navy and demanded that American companies should have the right to compete to put American paint on American ships in competition with these foreign companies. The Secretary of the Navy acceded to our reasonable request. They opened the competition to American companies. At the next competition five companies bid. An American company got the contract, and the price that they bid was about 50 per cent of what the Holzapfel and Rathjen people had been charging the Government—and incidentally those companies had been making the Government pay twice as much for antifouling paint on the bottom of their warships as they were selling the Government the same paint for to put on the bottom of the Panama Line where there was not that restriction. This outside company—I have forgotten the name—got the contract. What was the result? From that time to this the United States Navy Department has never advertised another competition for antifouling composition paint. The moment the monopoly of the Holzapfel and Rathjen Cos. was broken the Navy Department commenced to make its own paint, and they are making it yet, what they call standard composition antifouling paint, at the navy yard at Norfolk.

At about the same time my attention was called to some rather peculiar proceedings in connection with the ships of the Panama Line at Panama. On the recommendation of the Panama Commission the War Department had issued an advertisement for antifouling composition paint there, and they had asked for bids on four times as much paint as they could use in any one year.

I laid all the facts before Mr. Jacob M. Dickinson, then Secretary of War, who made an investigation and set the whole procedure aside, because he did not like the smell of it. Curiously enough, thereafter the Panama Commission found out it could make composition paint for the bottoms of their ships, and they ceased advertising. I went down to the office of the commission while the thing was on, and the Army officer in charge said, "Mr. BENNET, you act as though you thought our purchasing department was crooked." I said, "That is what I do think," and, subsequently, Members of this House may recall that members of the purchasing department of the Panama Canal Commission were indicted for graft.

Now, who was the president of the Holzapfel Paint Co. at that time, and who is the president of the Holzapfel Paint Co. at this time? John A. Donald, the man to whom has been turned over the shipping interests of this country.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I just wanted to ask a question whether it was the same man who has been put on this new board?

Mr. BENNET. That is the man, the president of a British steamship line, who employs Chinamen in violation of the British law, and who created such a situation six or seven years ago in relation to the American Navy that Republican Representatives protested to a Republican department and got his monopoly broken up; and, of course, there were all sorts of ugly stories about the way his company had retained its monopoly under both Republican and Democratic administrations, because he had had these two Navy orders under both administrations.

But I want to say to this House that the man who is the president of a corporation that has been engaged in a game like that ought not to be intrusted with the power of spending $50,000,000 of the Government's money in the purchase of ships. [Applause.] Why, New York City and the rest of the world is full of ships. There are ships and ships, and if this board is constituted as at present appointed, they will have all sorts of ships offered to them, from friends, from foes, and from neutrals, as one might say, old ships and new ships; and I want to put it plainly up to the Congress of the United States whether they want a man to pass on the expenditure of the money of the United States Government who has the record in connection with this Government that John A. Donald, president of the Holzapfel Paint Co., as I have shown, has.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not within the power of the United States Senate to reject that nomination?

Mr. BENNET. It is, and they ought to reject it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It is for them to take the responsibility if they do not.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman is quite correct. Not only are the shipping interests of New York City opposed to Mr. Donald, who lives in New York City, but the masters, mates, and pilots of that city are, and I quote from an article in the New York Herald of January 1, an interview with Arthur N. McGrory, secretary of the Neptune Association, composed of masters and mates of ocean and coastwise steam vessels, which fought many years for the provisions of the seamen's act and the shipping act, as the article says. It says further:

In scanning the names nominated for confirmation by the Senate we are simply amazed. We had expected to find on the commission at least one representative of American shipping.

Not one out of the five men is representative of American shipping, and we have 8,000,000 tons of American shipping.

Instead, what do we find? An admiralty lawyer from San Francisco, Mr. Denman, a Democrat, is given the long term of six years; Mr. Baker, of Baltimore, a Democrat, an ex-president of the Atlantic Transport Line, a British steamship company operating under the British flag, is given the five-year term; Mr. Donald, of New York, a Democrat, now president of the Donald Line, another British steamship company operating under the British flag, is given the four-year term; Mr. White, of Kansas City, Mo., a lumber merchant, a Republican, is given the three-year term, and Mr. Brent, of New Orleans, a Republican and a railroad official, is given the two-year term.

The steamships of the Donald Line, with the exception of the British licensed officers, are manned exclusively by Chinese in the deck, engine, steward, and cook departments, even the petty officers being Chinamen. Are we justified in expecting that the only two members of this commission having any steamship experience, whose whole environment has been British, can fulfill the purposes of the act, and can organized labor, which has fought for 20 years to have enacted provisions of law to prevent the employment of Chinese aboard our ships, find any consolation from the appointment of a member of this commission who has been one of the most notorious offenders against their cherished ideals? If Mr. Donald is interested in the development of our merchant marine, why has he, as a patriotic American citizen, failed to avail himself of the act of August 18, 1914, which permitted him to transfer his foreign-built ships to the American flag? Possibly he is waiting until our laws can be further amended so that those foreign-built ships can be admitted to our coastwise trade.

The appointment of a Republican from Louisiana sounds like a joke. The shipping act provides for drastic regulation of steamship rates, and the selection of a railroad official for this purpose baffles my comprehension. I had always thought, and orthodox economists so teach, that water transportation is the chief regulator of rail rates where both are in competition. The reverse process is indicated in this selection. Is it any wonder that Mr. Vanderlip, the president of the National City Bank, the greatest financial institution in the New World, recently designated the United States as a Nation of economic illiterates?

The appointment of a lumberman would seem to indicate that Mr. Dollar, president of the Dollar Steamship Co., who is primarily a lumberman and only secondarily a steamship operator, and who has been the most bitter opponent of organized labor in steamship affairs, would at least be well pleased with this selection. However, as Mr. Dollar has transferred some, if not all, of his ships from the American flag to the British since the passage of the seamen's act, which interfered with his Chinese crews, he may not be interested in this.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would not undertake to occupy so much time as that at this late hour in the afternoon——

Mr. HAUGEN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman? I will be glad to yield my time to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield that to the gentleman.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. That is very generous and kind, and I appreciate it very much and thank my friend from Iowa. I was just going to remark that I would not undertake at this late hour in the afternoon to occupy such an extensive length of time as is allotted to me as announced by the distinguished chairman if I had not received this enthusiastic reception immediately upon taking the floor. [Laughter.] And, further, I would not do so even then if I did not see the seats filled with Members of Congress and the galleries overflowing, all of whom would be disappointed if I did not speak [laughter], because the full attendance in the gallery and on the floor is because it was understood, I am sure, that at this moment I would take the floor and address the House and close the general debate on this important bill. [Applause.]

The bill under consideration in my judgment is one of the most important and one of the most beneficial to be presented to the House during this session of Congress. There is no industry in all the land that amounts to as much to the people at large and is more for their benefit, their welfare, and their prosperity than the agricultural business engaged in by the American people. [Applause.]

The truth of it is that this great and beautiful country of ours is in a general sense one great farm, for the reason that every other interest in the United States, of whatever character it may be, is absolutely dependent upon the prosperity of the farm and the production of the agricultural products of the land. Take that away and all the superstructure that stands above it and rests upon it will crumble to the ground, and there will be nothing in the world, from an industrial standpoint, left but desolation, want, misery, and woe. The railroads, factories, and every kind of business would be paralyzed and cease operation, but whenever prosperity permeates this country and reaches the farm and goes into the pockets of the farmers and the producers from the soil, then the prosperity that emanates from that source, like the sunshine of heaven, goes throughout the length and breadth of the land and makes the people happy, joyful, and buoyant. [Applause.]

This bill appropriates, Mr. Chairman, this time the sum of $25,694,685, which, together with the annual fixed appropriations, will amount in round numbers to about $36,000,000. When you take into consideration the great development in the country and the marvelous expansion in this land, and the prosperity such as has never been seen before, all adding to the wealth of the people of the United States, this is a comparatively small sum to appropriate to protect, carry on, and develop the great agricultural interests of America. [Applause.]

A comparatively few years ago, in 1887, I believe it was, the total wealth of the people of the United States of America was, in round numbers, $89,000,000,000, but this country has developed so rapidly that between that year and the present time the wealth of the people of the United States of America has increased to the enormous sum of $228,000,000,000, and, as I said a moment ago, all the prosperity and development that has gone forward with such a marvelous and rapid stride rests entirely and absolutely upon the development of the agricultural interests of the land, brought about by the faithful and patriotic service rendered by the tillers of the soil. They are the "salt of the earth" and the foundation of all real and genuine prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. LEVER. It may also be interesting to state that the year 1887 is coincident with the establishment of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. That explains largely why this great increase in wealth of this country has taken place, because the work that is being done by this great department is benefiting all the people of the country more, in my judgment, than the work of any other department of this great Government. [Applause.] Let me call your attention to this clipping from the Commercial Appeal, a great newspaper published in Memphis, Tenn., showing our wonderful prosperity. Here it is:

1916 RECORD FOR BUSINESS—WAS GREATEST 12 MONTHS IN COUNTRY'S HISTORY—ALL LINES PARTICIPATE.

The following review of the financial year is furnished the Commercial Appeal through the courtesy of J. J. Thornton, local representative of Bradstreet's agency:

"Nineteen hundred and sixteen was a wonderful year, but that characterization does only partial justice to this latest and greatest 12 months in the country's history. It was said of 1915 that adjectives were lacking fitly to portray that year's progress. So it may be said of 1916, in turn, that comparatives fail to describe the repeated examples of high records set up in nearly all lines of trade and industry, only to be displaced in turn and relegated to the rear by new and hitherto unheard-of totals of industrial production and trade volume, of bank clearings and building expenditure, of transportation earnings on land and on water, of export and import trade in merchandise, in gold and in silver, of mineral output and ship construction, of prices of all commodities, and of high levels of wages paid in most industries and of dividends paid by enterprises of all kinds. It would be far easier, in fact, to single out the lines that did not break records than to attempt to enumerate the multitude of directions in which trade expanded, industry set up new milestones of progress, and finance sought wider fields of exploitation.

"In 1915 the bogy of troublesome liquidation of our own stocks and bonds held abroad was finally laid, and we began to offer a market here for foreign securities; but in 1916 we definitely secured title to our position as a creditor nation, loaned freely to the entire world, and, despite hitherto unequaled purchases by us of belligerent securities, became possessed of gold imports in a volume such as was never before seen. To the spur of foreign war demand, represented by unheard-of quantities of food, munitions, and general merchandise sold abroad, was added a new and record-breaking volume of imports, largely of raw materials to feed our industrial machinery, while at the same time purely domestic trade grew beyond the most sanguine dreams of our merchants and manufacturers."

Here is another clipping from the same paper:

WAS PROSPEROUS YEAR—FARMERS, MANUFACTURERS, MERCHANTS, AND RAILROADS MADE MONEY.

NEW YORK, December 31.

Happy New Year. The well-meant prosperity in all ways and things is of unusual significance as 1917 dawns to the business men of this United States. To the very great majority 1916 was prosperous beyond dreams of avarice, much of that prosperity resulting from the awful war, but it came to the lowest-waged laborer and thence upward through all classes of society to the greatest capitalists.

Too often prosperity is measured by stock-exchange experience, doubtless because these are better advertised than is the case with any other business. But that is not prosperity itself, only its reflection.

Farmers and their dependents, practically 40 per cent of the population, never had a better year in spite of short crops, due to tremendous prices received for what was grown. No crop was an exception.

Manufacturers never saw such a year, with most earning from 50 per cent to 150 per cent, and even greater on capital employed, so that their end of the year reports to mercantile agencies are truly astounding in revelation of real prosperity.

Merchants had similar experiences.

Railroads made more than $1,000,000,000 net, surpassing anything of record.

Financial institutions all made money.

Only the salaried man was on the outside, and to him in more cases than ever before came the welcome "bonus," so that he, too, had at least cause of thanksgiving.

All this is history, but leads up to prospects for the happy new year. Therefore, what are the chances that this opening wish will be granted to all the people?

Nothing worth while can be accomplished without money and credit. Up to two years ago this country had some money and could extend some credit. Beginning with 1917, it has more money, including gold, than any nation, and it has turned completely around from debtor to creditor in fabulous amounts. It has a real banking and currency system—thanks to the Federal reserve act—which assures to every manufacturer and merchant easy money, and to any amount for any legitimate enterprise. Moreover, for the first time there are to be foreign agents of these reserve banks to finance export trade, and hence to stimulate it. "Acceptances" negotiable in normal times at any financial center of the world have come into use for the American man, and some time this year he will appreciate what it means. Just now it is new to him. So much for general trade.

Big business provided for as above and heretofore even it had to take chances where it now enjoys certainty, how about the middle stratum—the farmer and his dependents? Provision has just been made for him in the farm-loan banks. Heretofore he has been at the mercy of his local bank and subject to the agony of the maturing mortgage which he can not pay. Hereafter he can get his money at a reasonable rate. Crops were bad in 1916. There have never been two years in succession of bad crops in this country. Possibilities are here for a happy new year to the farmers.

Taking it all in all, from the farmer to the capitalist, prospects never were better than on this January 1 for a truly happy new year.

[Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, when you take into consideration the great wealth of our people, this enormous accumulation of wealth, and increase of wealth that has come to the American people, and then take into consideration the fact that the prosperity of all depends upon the productions of agriculture, the sum of $36,000,000 for the purpose of developing, for the purpose of fostering, for the purpose of encouraging all the business of the people of this country who make possible this enormous wealth of $228,000,000,000, is a very small sum indeed. [Applause.] We are the richest Nation in the world, and growing richer all the time.

As was stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] a moment ago, those who are on the farm are the ones who are helping the country more in a material way than any others. As he further said, it is necessary to encourage the development of the farm and secure that development in order to make it profitable, and in order to accomplish that result it is necessary to furnish the means that are being used by this department; and I agree with him that many more millions could be expended profitably through the Department of Agriculture if greater appropriations were made by Congress, which would greatly benefit every man, woman, and child in this great country. [Applause.]

The increases of the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture have not been in proportion to the development of the country. I have always been an economist. Gentlemen who have served with me upon the floor of this House during the years I have been here and who have doubtless noticed, I dare say, my votes, know that I have voted in the interest of economy and have voted only for those measures which were necessary for the welfare of the people in the different sections, and, for that matter, in all sections of our great country. I have never given my consent to or my vote for appropriations of any character or legislation of any kind unless I was convinced that the appropriations and legislation were for the good of the people, for the development of the country, and for the best interests of this Nation. [Applause.] But during the years I have served in this House I have advocated increased appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. [Applause.] I believe now if some of the other appropriations were reduced and the money applied to the work of this department the money would be better and more profitably spent. The Agricultural Committee, of which I am proud to be a member, gave this bill very careful study. The expenditures provided for it are conservative and necessary, and I trust that the bill will in its entirety receive the enthusiastic and generous support of the membership of this House. Vote for it, and when you do so be assured you are doing that which is best for your own constituents, my constituents, and all the people throughout this magnificent Republic. [Great applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19859) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

WILKES-BARRE, PA., January 4, 1917.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I request leave of absence for a few days, on account of important business.

JOHN J. CASEY.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Friday, January 5, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KETTNER: A bill (H. R. 19617) to incorporate the National Association of Life Underwriters; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Clapp	Lewis	Robinson	Tillman
Clark	Lodge	Saulsbury	Townsend
Culberson	McCumber	Shafroth	Vardaman
Curtis	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Walsh
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Watson
Gronna	Nelson	Simmons	Works
Hardwick	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Hitchcock	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Hollis	Overman	Smith, Mich.

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] on account of illness.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained at his home through illness.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator from California permit me to interrupt him to request the consideration of a resolution asking for information from one of the departments?

Mr. WORKS. I yield for that purpose.

GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 307), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested and directed to furnish to the Senate the following information: The relation, if any, of the organizations known as the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation, or any other private or corporate enterprise to the work of the Bureau of Education; a statement showing the names and positions of all employees, if any, of the Bureau of Education whose salaries are paid in whole or in part from funds contributed by the Rockefeller Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation, or from any other private or corporate funds or from funds derived from any source other than the Government of the United States; the names and positions of all administrative or other officers, if any, of the Bureau of Education who are in any way connected with the work of the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation, or any other private or corporate enterprise, and the salaries, if any, received by them from the said Rockefeller Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation, or any other private or corporate or other source than the Government of the United States.

SENATOR FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it is with pleasure that I present the credentials of my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER], elected to the United States Senate. I ask that they be read.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows:

STATE OF WASHINGTON,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, OLYMPIA.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1916, MILES POINDEXTER was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Washington a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1917.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State to be affixed at Olympia this 28th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1916.

[SEAL.] ERNEST LISTER, Governor.

By the governor:

I. M. HOWELL, Secretary of State.

PEACE OVERTURE.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, with the leave of the Senator from California, I desire to present an amendment which I intend to propose to the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I ask that it may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend Senate resolution 298 as follows:

Strike out the words "action taken" and insert the word "request."
Strike out the word "sending," in line 2.
In line 4 strike out the words "suggesting and recommending."

So that if amended the resolution would read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the request by the President in the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to present an amendment to Senate resolution 298.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield?

Mr. WORKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the Secretary read the amendment to the so-called Hitchcock resolution that I offer and also read the resolution as it would read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 of the resolution strike out the words "suggesting and recommending" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in so far as said notes recommend," so that if amended the resolution would read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war in so far as said notes recommend that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WORKS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The speech entire is as follows:

DOWNWARD TENDENCIES OF GOVERNMENT AND CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am soon to turn back to the people of California the trust they imposed upon me by electing me a Member of this body. I do so voluntarily, without regret, and with entire satisfaction. I came to the Senate too late in life to render any great or lasting service to my country if I were otherwise competent and able to do so, but not too late to learn by experience some valuable lessons and to acquire most important information respecting some of the weaknesses of our form of government and its administration and the dangers that are confronting the Nation now and which may, unless jealously guarded against, threaten, if not destroy, our republican institutions; lessons that should be taught to every American citizen, especially of the younger generation, and information that should not be withheld from them—information that may put them on their guard and serve to make them better, more loyal, more patriotic citizens.

I am a very sincere believer in the beneficence and practical value to the human race of our form of government. The men who founded the Government and framed the Constitution for the guidance and protection of its people builded wiser and better than they then knew. Human foresight could not have disclosed to them the future growth and greatness of the country, its future relations with other nations of the world, its vast trade and commerce at home and abroad, and the complications and vexing problems that must arise under these changed conditions. It is one of the wonders of their wisdom and forethought and their anxious desire to lay the foundations of the Government deep and sure that the form of government devised by them and the Constitution they established has served every purpose of the Government, with all its growth and expansion, with but slight changes, for more than a century. They laid the foundation of a Government of 13 States, with a population of less than 4,000,000 people. It has now become a Nation of 48 States, some of them greater and more powerful and with a population in each of them greater than the entire Nation at the time the Constitution was adopted, and the population of the entire Nation exceeds 100,000,000 people. The fact that we might become an imperial Government and acquire control of and govern foreign territory inhabited by peoples of another tongue than our own was not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. And yet its provisions, its authority, its limitations have been sufficient to meet the necessities, the complications, and the increased obligations of the Nation as a great world power. Their work is one of the greatest wonders of the world.

Mr. President, I have no doubt of the efficiency of our form of government. Rightly administered and patriotically preserved and protected, the Government will endure for all time and stand as a safe and lasting protection of its people in their lives and their liberties. The dangers to the Republic and the liberties of its people do not arise from any weakness or defect in our form of government, but from a departure from its principles, the maladministration of its affairs, the failure to observe and enforce its free principles, and the disregard and violation of the provisions and particularly the limitations of the Constitution. That these things are being done repeatedly, day after day, no one who has served in this body as long as I have can entertain the slightest doubt. That they are perilous to our free institutions and may, and, if persisted in, will eventually compass their destruction, is certain. Thomas Jefferson, one of the greatest statesmen of his time, and a profound believer in the wisdom of our form of government, was apprehensive of the dangers that are now actually confronting us and of the effect of a disregard of the limitations of the Constitution. His greatest fear, often affirmed, was of the unwarranted usurpation by the courts of a power not given them. Subsequent events have amply proved that his fears were not without foundation. The Constitution relating to the powers of the National Government as they affect the sovereign rights of the States has been so expanded to meet apparent necessities as to make it in many respects a wholly different Constitution from that designed and formulated by its framers and as understood and construed by them. Some of the decisions of the court of last resort are practically amendments to the Constitution brought about without the assent of the people given in the manner provided in the Constitution itself. But this stretch of authority by the judicial department of the Government is insignificant when compared with the encroachments on the Constitution and usurpation of authority by the President of the United States, the head of the executive department.

It is my purpose to deal freely, frankly, and without reservation with present and past conditions and tendencies and their probable, if not certain, effects upon the future destinies of the country and its people. Before passing to the discussion of particular evil tendencies, let me say a word on the general subject of the decay and downfall of nations and the fears of some of our own countrymen for the future of this Republic.

It is sometimes maintained that nations, like men, grow from infancy to manhood or full growth and then decline in strength and life until final dissolution. Draper in his Intellectual Development of Europe takes the unqualified position that nations like individuals are born, grow, and crumble away by the process of their own growth. Be this as it may, there are evils that afflict the life of a nation just as men are afflicted with disease and these may sap the vitality and hasten the decay and final downfall and dissolution of the nation as the death of man is hastened by disease.

In the preface to An Inquiry into the Permanent Causes of the Decline and Fall of Powerful and Wealthy Nations, by William Playfair, published in 1805, the author quotes Edmund Burke as saying:

> In all speculations upon men and human affairs it is of no small moment to distinguish things of accident from permanent causes and from effects that can not be altered. I am not quite of the mind of those speculators who seem assured that necessarily and by the constitution of things all States have the same period of infancy, manhood, and decrepitude that are found in the individuals who compose them. The objects which are attempted to be forced into an analogy are not founded in the same classes of existence. Individuals are physical beings, subject to laws universal and invariable; but commonwealths are not physical, but moral essences. They are artificial combinations, and in their proximate efficient cause the arbitrary productions of the human mind. * * * I doubt whether the history of mankind is yet complete enough, if ever it can be so, to furnish grounds for a sure theory on the internal causes which necessarily affect the fortune of a State. I am far from denying the operation of such causes, but they are infinitely uncertain and much more obscure and much more difficult to trace than the foreign causes that tend to depress and sometimes overwhelm society.

In commenting on this statement of Mr. Burke the author says:

> The writer, who has thus expressed his skepticism on this sort of inquiry, speaks at the same time of the importance of distinguishing between accidental and permanent causes. He doubts whether the history of mankind is complete enough, or if ever it can be so, to furnish grounds for a sure theory on the internal causes which necessarily affect the fortune of a State. Thus he not only admits the existence of permanent causes, but says clearly that it is from history they are discoverable, if ever their discovery can be accomplished. This is going as far as we could wish, and as for the sure theory we join issue with him in despairing of ever obtaining one that will deserve the name of sure.
> When the Romans were in their vigor their city was besieged by the Gauls and saved by an animal of proverbial stupidity, but this could not have happened when Attila was under the walls and the energy of the citizens was gone. The taking or saving the city in the first instance would have been equally accidental and the consequences of short duration, but in the latter days the fall of Rome was owing to permanent causes and the effect has been without a remedy.
> It is, then, only concerning the permanent causes—that is to say, causes that are constantly acting and produce permanent effects—that we mean to inquire, and even with regard to those it is not expected to establish a theory that will be applicable with certainty to the preservation of a State, but merely to establish one, which may serve as a safe guide on a subject the importance of which is great beyond calculation.
> There remains but one other consideration in reply to this, and that is, whether States have necessarily by the constitution and nature of things the same periods of infancy, manhood, and decrepitude that are found in the individuals that compose them. Mr. Burke thinks they have not; and, indeed, if they had, the following inquiry would be of no sort of utility. It is of no importance to seek for means of preventing what must of necessity come to pass; but if the word necessity is changed for tendency or propensity, then it becomes an inquiry deserving attention, and as all States have risen, flourished, and fallen there can be no dispute with regard to their tendency to do so.

It must be observed also that the nature and kind of government should be taken into account in any effort to determine the effects upon its future life and efficiency of given evils that may have entered into its social and economic affairs or its administration. In theory at least our own Republic is governed by the people, through representatives chosen by them in the manner provided by law. It is not a pure democracy, but a representative democracy properly denominated a Republic. Such a government may be destroyed by taking away from the people its control and administration. It may by acts of usurpation on the part of its chosen representatives be converted into a despotism under a dictator, made so by his own assumption and exercise of unwarranted and unlawful power; and the union of the States may be destroyed by the usurpation of unconstitutional power on the part of the Federal Government, thus making it a centralized, despotic government ruled by one man, completely destroying popular and free government and converting it into something much worse than a lawfully constituted monarchy. And, sir, that is the greatest danger that is confronting this Nation now, as I shall show presently, and it is a growing menace to free popular government.

In the very interesting book to which I have just referred it is further said, in justification of the efforts of the author to trace the causes of the decay of nations:

> The history of 3,000 years, and of nations that have risen to wealth and power, in a great variety of situations, all terminating with a considerable degree of similarity, discovers the great outline of the causes that invigorate or degrade the human mind and thereby raise or ruin states and empires.

By almost common consent there are two recognized causes of national decay, namely, inordinate wealth and great power exceeding that of other nations. Gibbon in his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire says:

> The decline of Rome was the natural and inevitable effect of immoderate greatness. Prosperity ripened the principle of decay, the causes of destruction multiplied with the extent of conquest, and as soon as time or accident had removed the artificial supports the stupendous fabric yielded to the pressure of its own weight.

Ferrero in his Greatness and Decline of Rome couples with this the loss of power on the part of the senate, the indifference of the aristocracy to the affairs of the empire and the interests of the people. Lecky in his History of European Morals attributes the decay of Rome to three great causes—the imperial system, the institution of slavery, and the gladiatorial shows—and says:

> The theory of the Roman Empire was that of a representative despotism. The various offices of the Republic were not annihilated, but they were gradually concentrated in a single man. The senate was still ostensibly the depository of supreme power, but it was made, in fact, the mere creature of the Emperor, whose power was virtually uncontrolled.

Mr. President, if we substitute the President of this Republic for the Roman Emperor and the Congress of the United States for the Roman Senate, we have here a not inaccurate description of the condition to which we are rapidly tending. Wealth results in enervating and corrupting idleness and luxury, and excessive power and greatness leads to encroachments upon other countries, conquest, and the acquisition of foreign territory. That our own Nation is now feeling the evil effects of its growing wealth and power, tending to its final destruction, no observing and thoughtful man will presume to deny. The great problem is whether the good sense and patriotism of the masses of the American people, especially of the so-called middle class, are going to be able to withstand this downward tendency of government and preserve the Nation in the form in which our ancestors handed it down to us. I have great faith in the patriotism and manhood of the American people. I believe if they are warned in time and made to comprehend the dangers threatening their Government, they will meet and overcome those dangers by their loyal support of the principles upon which the Government is founded. But, sir, they need to be warned. An earnest appeal to their loyalty and love of liberty at such a time and in the face of impending danger to the most cherished principles of freedom and independence of the State and the individual can not be out of place in this Chamber.

Again, turning to the book from which I first quoted, we find this relating to the experience of the Roman Empire that is not without significance as applied to our own present condition:

After the great influx of wealth had corrupted Rome, its public expenses increased at an enormous rate, till at last that portion of the tribute exacted from the Provinces which it pleased the armies and the generals to remit to Rome became unequal to the expenditure. Taxation of every kind then became necessary in Italy itself, and the evils that attend the multiplication of imposts were greatly augmented by the ignorant manner in which they were laid on, by men who understood little but military affairs, added to the severe manner in which they were levied by a rude, imperious, and debauched soldiery.

The enormous expenses of our Government, constantly increasing, and the great increase in our Army and Navy, when we look back at the awful experience of other nations, should give us pause and lead us to look to our own tendencies downward.

The book from which I have been quoting was written more than a hundred years ago, but it contains much matter worthy of thought and consideration. If we come down to later times and consider the words of wisdom coming from our own countrymen and other statesmen and students of the history of nations, we have even greater reason to look into the conditions and tendencies of our own Republic and the manners of its people. These I shall consider more in detail when I come to deal with specific evils threatening to our own Nation.

The late Lord Roberts, the great English general, believed that one of the great causes of national degeneracy and decay is overcivilization and that the remedy for it is war.

I am not willing to accept the theory that war is a necessary or even an efficient means of regenerating a profligate or venal government. There must be a higher and more efficient means than this. Civic virtue, or true patriotism, can not come out of the horrors of wholesale murder. A corrupt nation that goes to war will inevitably sink again to this low standard when the war is over. The remedy lies in the better education of the people, an aroused patriotism, and, in a government of the people, a truer sense of the individual duty and responsibility of its citizens.

Having thus briefly and inadequately dealt with the general subject, and especially the dangers that confront every nation whatever its form of government, I pass to a more detailed consideration of some of the specific evils that are threatening the perpetuity of our own Republic.

EXECUTIVE USURPATION OF POWER.

As a fitting text for what I am about to say on the subject of executive usurpation of power, I take the following plank of the Democratic platform of 1912:

We believe in the preservation and maintenance in their full strength and integrity of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—each keeping within its own bounds and not encroaching upon the just powers of either of the others.

Many of the planks of that platform have been ruthlessly violated in practice by this administration, which came into power under it, but none more openly and flagrantly than this one. We look in vain in the Democratic platform of 1916 for a renewal of this wholesome pledge.

As I have pointed out, the fear of judicial usurpation of power was uppermost in the mind of Mr. Jefferson, but he and others were able to see the danger now confronting us of the unwarranted and unconstitutional usurpation of power by the President, amounting, practically, to a dictatorship, and the complacent surrender of its powers and functions and abandonment of its duties and obligations by the Congress of the United States. The tendency toward centralized, unchecked, and unlimited power on the part of the President has existed for some years past and has grown rapidly worse and more offensive in the last four years. Never in the entire history of the country has the President so completely and defiantly usurped the law-making powers of the Government and dictated and forced the course of Congress, and never has the Congress been so submissive or subservient to a power outside itself. Never in all our history have we come so near to a despotic government by a dictator as during the last four years.

Members of Congress have, under the lash of Executive and party domination, surrendered their conscientious convictions and voted against their own sentiments of right and justice. We have on the statute books to-day not one but many enactments that are the laws of a dictator and not the free and voluntary acts of the Congress, and we have men holding offices of the highest trust whose confirmation was the result of this same dictatorial power and not the free and voluntary action of this body.

In a speech delivered by me March 6, 1914, in this Chamber, on "One year of Democratic rule," I had this to say on this subject:

Mr. President, I come now to comment on what I consider one of the most important of the questions that are confronting Congress to-day, if not the most important of them all, and that is the evident purpose of the Executive to dominate and control the legislative branch of the Government. I have had occasion to speak of it before and since this administration came into power. It was bad enough under previous administrations, but in this one it has increased a hundredfold over anything that has been known in the past. This dominating influence has become so insistent and continuous, and has been submitted to so slavishly by the majority of Congress, that the independence and usefulness of the legislative branch of the Government are both threatened. It has been so asserted and exercised and obediently submitted to that we have come perilously near to a dictatorship. The President has not contented himself by advising what measures should be considered by Congress and vetoing them if they do not meet his approval, as the Constitution authorizes him to do. He has demanded that certain legislation shall be enacted, has insisted upon Congress remaining in session until the laws he insists upon are enacted, and the secret caucus is made the instrument with which to enforce his will. As a consequence we have laws on the statute books that are in effect, and in reality, Executive orders and not legislative acts. They are legislation of and enacted by the executive department and not by Congress. It is a condition that should attract the serious attention of the whole country. We have three distinct departments of government. They were intended by the framers of the Constitution to be independent of each other. It has, up to a very late period, been regarded as absolutely necessary to the liberty of the people and the public welfare that this independence should be maintained.

I then quoted, and now repeat, the wise caution of George Washington in his Farewell Address, in which he said:

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power by dividing and distributing it into different depositories and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against the invasions of the others has been evidenced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates; but let there be no change by usurpation, for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

And in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 190) the Supreme Court of the United States had this to say on this important subject:

It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law that all the powers intrusted to Government, whether State or National, are divided into the three grand departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. That the functions appropriate to each of these branches of government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants, and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons intrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the power confided to the others, but that each shall by the law of its creation be limited to the exercise of the powers appropriate to its own department and no other.

The court, in its opinion, referred to some exceptions to the general rule including the influence of the President over legislation by veto and the power of the Senate to participate in appointments to office, but these do not affect the question I am now discussing.

Mr. Jefferson, who, as I have said, was fearful of the effect of the undue assumption of power on the part of the President and his control over other departments of Government, has this to say:

I said to the President [Washington] that if the equilibrium of the three great bodies, legislative, executive, and judiciary, could be preserved, if the legislature could be kept independent, I should never fear the result of such a government, but I could not but be uneasy when I saw that the executive had swallowed up the legislative branch.

What has destroyed the liberty and the rights of man in every government which has ever existed under the sun? The generalizing and concentrating all cares and powers into one body, no matter whether of the autocrats of Russia or France or of the aristocrats of a Venetian senate.

The President of the United States, by the Constitution, is possessed of greater power than most monarchs or kings. He is not only President of the Republic, but is Commander in Chief of both the Army and Navy, and is vested with full and unrestrained power in the administration of the Government's affairs and the execution and enforcement of its laws. It would seem that powers so vast as these would satisfy the ambition of any man.

Let me call attention to some of the flagrant unwarranted assumptions of power on the part of the President.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Democratic platform under which the present administration came into power declared in respect of the Panama Canal:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

This platform declaration was supported by the President in his campaign for election. In conformity to it a law was passed exempting such ships from the payment of tolls. Soon after his election, in a message to Congress, he practically demanded that this free-toll clause in the law be repealed. He gave no specific reason for this change of sentiment on his own part or for his demand that the platform of his party should be violated by Democratic Members of Congress.

Leading Democratic Members of both House and Senate had not only voted for this exemption clause in the statute but had made speeches in its favor. On the demand of the President, and for no other apparent reason, the same Members made speeches in favor of repealing the statute that they had so earnestly advocated, and voted for its repeal. The President was not content with recommending the repeal in his message. This was entirely within his constitutional powers. He urged it upon individual members of Congress in such way as to amount practically to a threat. He descended to the level of a common lobbyist made infinitely worse by the fact that as such his great office gave him a power and influence far exceeding that of all other lobbyists. This change of front on the part of Congress was a most humiliating spectacle. The lack of moral courage displayed by the legislative branch of the Government was a grave menace to good government. The conduct of the President was that of a dictator and not the act of a President of the United States. It was the act of a public official who either did not understand or was willing to violate the constitutional limitations of power by which he should have been controlled.

TRUST AND OTHER LEGISLATION.

When the Democratic Party came into possession of the Government, apparently next to getting control of all the offices its one desire and ambition was to pass some popular legislation that would perpetuate it in power. The people had been made to believe that antitrust legislation was necessary for the protection of the public interest; that we must have better banking and currency laws; that some means must be devised to enable the farmers to obtain additional credit and more easily borrow money and run into debt; that organized labor needed better protection; that the merchant marine needed legislative aid; and that Federal child-labor laws must be enacted for the better protection of children who were compelled by circumstances to engage in manual labor. Other laws were conceived to be necessary for the common good. The idea that such laws would be beneficial and for the general good was proclaimed and made popular. When this was done it was only necessary, in order to gain public favor, to enact laws properly labeled as antitrust, banking and currency, rural-credit, or child-labor laws. Whether they were good or bad, whether they were actually needed or not, that was of but little consequence. Up to the present time none of them have proved to be of any practical value, and in all probability never will be, but the people generally could not know this. Indeed, no one can tell today whether these much-boasted laws have served, or ever will serve, the public interests. But that made but little difference. They did serve the interests of the Democratic Party. They were heralded broadcast as the greatest legislative achievements in the history of the Government. Whether this claim had any merit other than a means of deceiving the public and securing votes time alone will tell. I venture to predict that the pretense that these laws were in the public interest will prove in the end to be almost, if not wholly, unfounded.

But, sir, I am not so much concerned just now as to the merits of these several laws as I am in the means by which they were enacted. They may not of themselves do any great harm if they do no good, but if they found their way onto the statute books through the exercise of unwarranted and unconstitutional power on the part of the executive department of the Government, that is a matter of transcendent importance. That the enactment of most of them was procured by such means we all know. They were first recommended by the President. In making this recommendation, if made by a message or messages to Congress in the manner authorized by the Constitution, the Executive was strictly within his rights and no one could justly complain of his action. But he did not stop there. He and his Cabinet joined in an effort to enforce and compel action on bills introduced to carry out his recommendations. The President and heads of the departments joined in the effort to influence action by Congress favorable to the views of the President. Individual Senators were interviewed by these executive officers, who should have had nothing to do with legislation. Meetings and consultations were held at the White House and directions given to Members of Congress respecting the kind of laws to be enacted, both the President and members of his Cabinet becoming lobbyists in behalf of the bills the Chief Magistrate desired to have passed. In order to insure their passage they were denominated "administration measures," and Members of Congress were appealed to to support the administration. If this was not sufficient to coerce action by Congress, secret caucuses were held and unwilling Members were bound by caucus action to support them, and caucus action was procured by the cry that they were "administration measures" and the President wanted them. Nothing like it was ever known before. Let us hope it will never happen again. If this kind of Executive coercion is persisted in and submitted to by Congress, then our Government is no longer a government of the people. It is not a democracy. It is not a republic. It is a despotism worse than any known monarchy.

I can not express by any language that I can call to my use my abhorrence of this despotic and dictatorial course on the part of the executive department of the Government or express strongly enough my fear and apprehension of the consequences of such course of conduct to the future of our country.

THE SHIP-PURCHASE BILL.

The ship-purchase bill furnishes a striking example of Executive legislation. An attempt was made at the last Congress to literally force it through by presidential and department dictation and caucus coercion. To their everlasting credit be it said that seven Democratic Senators stood by their convictions and opposed the passage of the bill to the end, in spite of the enormous pressure brought to bear upon them and the bitter personal abuse heaped upon them by some of their more submissive and time-serving colleagues. The bill, having been defeated by the last Congress, was again introduced at the last session, modified to meet the views of these opposing Senators. It is not my purpose to discuss the merits of the bill, which has now been passed and become a law. I am dealing only with the means by which it was forced through Congress, which was nothing less than shameful.

THE TARIFF LAW.

We have on the statutes now a tariff law which, if the European war had not intervened, would have been disastrous to the country. It was passed against the convictions of a majority of the Members of Congress and by the same methods employed to secure the passage of the ship-purchase bill. The President insisted upon having sugar and wool placed on the free list against the wishes and convictions of the leaders of his party in Congress, men who had studied the tariff question and were entirely familiar with the subject, while the President knew nothing about it. Notwithstanding this, he set his will against Congress and forced the bill through. This was well understood by everybody here. It was openly stated on the floor of the Senate by Senators of his own party. The folly of his insistence upon these provisions in the tariff law soon became apparent. The free-sugar clause lost the Government something like $50,000,000. Without this source of revenue heavy direct taxes must be imposed to support the Government. So that clause of the law was repealed at the following session of Congress.

THE RESERVE-BANK ACT.

The reserve-bank act was another piece of legislation forced through an unwilling Congress by presidential dictation and caucus rule. Not only the President but members of his Cabinet, one in particular, brought to bear the whole power of the executive department of the Government to insure the passage of the bill. But for this unwarranted and unlawful interference the bill would never have been passed, the business of the country would never have been burdened with 12 reserve banks, when 1 bank would better have served the purpose sought to be accomplished—and no bank at all was necessary—nor would the people have been forced to pay the large and wholly unnecessary salaries of the Reserve Board and other expenses running up into the millions. The people have been made to believe that this banking and currency legislation was necessary; but everything that has been or ever will be accomplished by it could have been brought about by very simple provisions extending the powers of the Treasury Department, or, at most, the establishment of one central bank wholly under Government control and supervision. The scheme as now provided for has proved to be inefficient, unreasonably expensive, and unnecessary.

But this was an administration measure, and was forced through as such.

THE CHILD-LABOR BILL.

Bad as the others were, the Executive domination and control over the child-labor bill was probably the worst and least excusable of all. It was a popular measure. The election was coming on. Its passage by a Democratic Congress would make Democratic votes. The Democratic steering committee had missed this political opportunity. It had determined that this particular bill should go over to the next session. But the President saw the opportunity that must be taken advantage of to gain favor for his party. So, although he had previously declared such legislation to be unconstitutional, he came in person to the Capitol and interviewed individual Senators and insisted that this bill be made a part of the program for the balance of the session and be passed, and as usual he had his way. This was a plain case of private lobbying with individual Senators, which was unpardonable; but it was made much worse by the transparent political motive behind it and the inconsistent attitude of the President in insisting upon the passage of a bill that he himself had declared in unqualified terms to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The political character of the whole proceeding was clearly disclosed in the discussion of the bill. The attempt was made to excuse the President for this breach of official duty, to say nothing of the gross impropriety of it, by claiming that in what he did he was not acting as President of the United States but as the leader of his party. The following brief colloquy on the floor of the Senate between the able, fearless, and independent junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and myself discloses this fact:

Mr. WORKS. The Senator has referred to the very unfortunate fact that the President of the United States has come to be regarded also as the leader of the political party to which he belongs.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think it is an unfortunate fact.

Mr. WORKS. I want to ask the Senator whether he understood that these suggestions about bringing on certain legislation were made in the capacity of President of the United States or in the capacity of leader of the Democratic Party?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will answer the Senator very frankly. My understanding—I did not talk to the President about this last matter—but my understanding in a way is that the suggestion was made by the President as the party leader and advised in a party way.

Mr. WORKS. Would not the Senator regard it as an impropriety for the President to urge any action on the part of the Senate as President of the United States?

Mr. HARDWICK. Except in a message to Congress in the way pointed out by the Constitution.

Mr. WORKS. I agree with the Senator very heartily in that statement.

But, Mr. President, this only makes the matter worse. It puts the President in the humiliating attitude of lobbying as a private individual to secure the passage of important legislation affecting the public interests as the head of a political party for political reasons and political advantage, himself then being a candidate, hoping to be benefited by the legislation he was seeking if enacted. A little further along I shall give attention to the leader of a political party, at the same time the Chief Magistrate of the Nation, two entirely inconsistent positions.

WATER-POWER AND LEASING LEGISLATION.

Most strenuous and determined efforts were made by the administration, and especially by two of the executive departments, to secure legislation authorizing the leasing of public lands in general and particularly of power sites. The people have been made to believe that the Federal Government is the owner not only of lands on the streams within the States, but of the waters of the streams from and by which water power may be developed, and under that pretense or false assumption it was proposed to confer upon the Government the power to regulate and control the use of the waters of such streams and the power to be developed thereby. In fact, the Government has no ownership of the water in streams flowing within the States or right to regulate, control, or limit its use. But bills were formulated, not in Congress or by Members of it, but by representatives of the executive department, the effect of which would be not only to invade the rights of the States, but to change the whole policy of the Government in dealing with the public domain. The bills were made administration measures. They were pressed upon Congress as such. The Interior Department urged and labored for their enactment. Long and exhaustive hearings were had on them by committees of both Houses. At all of these hearings one or more representatives of the Interior Department were constantly present, attempting to carry out the policy of the President and shape and fashion the bills to suit his ideas. The President was advised with by Democratic members of the committees from time to time to ascertain what would be satisfactory to him. His aid was sought and given to secure the passage of such legislation as he desired. The bills as they were framed and insisted upon by the executive department were made a part of the administration program to which I shall refer a little later on. The bills recommended and pressed upon Congress in this unwarranted way were not satisfactory to a majority of the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and I am glad to say that some of the Democratic members of the committee, notwithstanding Executive influence and party pressure, stood out against the bills to the end, even after they had been radically changed in committee. This was one of the worst and most inexcusable cases of Executive interference with and attempt to control legislation by Congress that has come to my notice. The part taken by the several executive departments to influence and bring about or defeat legislation I shall consider separately further along.

EIGHT-HOUR LEGISLATION AND ARBITRATION.

The latest case of usurpation of power and unwarranted dictation by the President was brought about by the threatened strike of railroad employees for an eight-hour day and extra pay for additional hours of labor. The President, without the slightest constitutional or legal authority, undertook to force a settlement of the controversy on terms arbitrarily fixed by him and without investigation or knowledge of the facts or the effect of the concession attempted to be forced on the railroads by him. Having failed in his purpose, he brought to bear all the power and influence of his great office to coerce Congress to do by hasty and ill-advised legislation what he was unable to do through the powerful influence of his exalted official position as President of the United States. To make the matter worse, it was thoroughly understood that the result of the efforts to avoid a strike would have a powerful and widespread influence upon the coming election of President and the then occupant of the office, who was a candidate for reelection. So we had the Chief Magistrate of the Nation assuming, without any right or authority, to force action in his own interest as a candidate for office and the support of his views and his efforts by Democratic Members of Congress tempted by like considerations in the interest of their party and their own candidacy for reelection. How far, if at all, the President and members of his party were influenced by partisan and self-seeking motives in their efforts to avert the strike no one can tell. The temptation was great. The action taken might mean the success or defeat of their party at the coming election. But, sir, the Chief Magistrate of this great Nation and its lawmakers should so conduct themselves in office as to be above the taint of suspicion of their motives. The President was not called upon to act in a matter in which he was personally interested. He should not have done so any more than a judge should sit to try a case in which his own personal interests are involved. As for Congress, it probably had the right to deal with the question by way of legislation, but it is most unfortunate that in a matter of such grave consequence it should apparently have been driven to act without hearing or investigation and practically without knowledge. To deal with the subject in this way was made more unfortunate because of the fact that the vital question of arbitration of labor disputes was involved and the principle of arbitration for the time being repudiated by the lawmaking power of the Government. Taking it all in all, the action taken by both the President and by Congress was most deplorable. The whole situation was properly characterized in the following statement of the New York Times:

The blackmailing of the whole Nation under the threat of a strike and the extortion from a nation's legislature of a special act granting the demands of the brotherhoods without time to inquire into its justice or its practicability put upon the country an intolerable humiliation. It reduces 100,000,000 people to a condition of vassalage, no longer permitted to make laws that freely express their will, but held up, as the highwayman's victim is held up, and forced to instant compliance with the terms imposed upon them by the leaders of organizations comprising only 400,000 of their number. But there is no other instance where a Congress of the United States has been forced to make laws under threat of a small part of the people to do immeasurable and irreparable injury to the others. If such an outrage can be put upon us unresisted, we have lost our republican form of government.

And the Chicago Tribune very well says:

The spectacle of an organized minority, backed by the President of the United States, choking Congress into surrender is the most sinister and alarming since the rebellion of the South. It ought to stir the Nation, and we believe it will. If Congress is ready to throw up its prerogative, the American people are not ready to surrender their birthright, and legislation under duress of organized force is the worst of surrenders.

The small minority of labor which is thrusting this humiliation upon the weakness of politicians is doing the cause of labor an injury it will suffer from for many a day. No foreseeing friend of labor will approve it.

APPOINTMENT TO OFFICE.

The unwarranted and unconstitutional interference by the President with the prerogatives of Congress, and attempts to control and coerce action by it, has not been confined to legislative action, but has extended to executive action of the Senate in the confirmation of nominations to office. When the President has made a nomination to office his whole duty has been performed and his power exhausted. Any attempt on his part to influence the Senate, or any Member of it, to act favorably upon the appointment is an offense against both the Constitution and the Senate. But this has been no restraint on the President. Two conspicuous instances of Executive usurpation in this respect may be given. One was the nomination of a member of the Reserve Board under the new banking and currency law, the other of a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The first was rejected by the Senate after a bitter contest; the other was confirmed. This was done, I am convinced, over the conscientious convictions of a majority of both the Judiciary Committee and the Senate. The opposition on the Democratic side of the Chamber was overcome, in part, by the strenuous efforts and powerful influence of the executive department, including the President and members of his cabinet, and Senators who had theretofore stood courageously for their convictions succumbed to them in this instance, thereby making the confirmation possible. It was a shocking example of the unwarranted influence of one department of government over another. When men can be elevated to the exalted position of Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States by such methods and through such influences, we may well tremble for the future of our country.

I have only given these two cases as examples of the way things have been conducted of late. There are many others of less importance, but involving the same principle, that might be mentioned. The effort to support the President's nominations to office, when needed, by personal influence, has been habitual and often persistent and offensive.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROGRAM OF LEGISLATION.

Another of the disquieting innovations of the present administration has been the laying down for the Congress by the President of a program of legislation composed of bills selected by him, which are expected to take precedence over bills introduced and advocated by Members of Congress. This has been practiced and submitted to by Congress to an alarming degree. It is an unwarranted interference with and regulation of the business of Congress by the Executive. It enables him to procure the passage of bills of his dictation to the exclusion of other bills without regard to their comparative merits. It has brought about the passage of some bills and the defeat of others. It is a regulation of its business by the President that Congress should not allow. At the last session, to say nothing of other legislation, it defeated the immigration bill favored by an overwhelming majority of Congress and demanded by the people of the country, and secured the passage of the child-labor bill, affecting a very limited number of people and of much less public interest.

OUR RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Nothing could more clearly show the enormous powers of the President and his control over the destinies of the Government than has our, or his, dealings with the Republic of Mexico for the past few years. The President has, practically without limit, controlled our affairs and fixed our relations with that country. Twice in the last three years have we gone to war with Mexico by Executive action and without the sanction of Congress, which alone has power to declare war—once when we bombarded Vera Cruz without adequate cause or provocation and took possession of and held that city for months by military force, and again when later we invaded that country with a force of something like 15,000 men, held and occupied Mexican territory, and slaughtered Mexican citizens in actual warfare. In the first instance we professed to invade Mexico for the sole purpose of compelling a salute to our flag that it was claimed had been insulted, and in the other that our invasion of the territory of a country with which we were at peace was for punitive purposes only and intended to bring to justice Villa and other outlaws who had invaded our own territory and murdered some of our citizens. As to the first of these, it has been publicly proclaimed by a member of the President's Cabinet that the purpose alleged at the time was a mere pretense, and that the real object of the invasion was to oust the then President of Mexico from office and power, which was an act of war upon a feeble and distracted sister Republic. The other was no less a false pretense. No such Army as we sent into Mexico was necessary for the alleged purpose of our invasion of that country. There were other undisclosed reasons for that military invasion of a foreign country which, as in the case of the forcible taking of Vera Cruz, will in time be made known. It was probably done to prevent action by Congress providing for intervention in Mexico and the establishment for the unfortunate people of that country of a stable form of government, and at the same time for the protection of the lives and property of our own citizens resident there.

In addition to this course, presumably as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President, in his civil capacity, has fixed and determined our relations with Mexico solely on his own responsibility. He has not only failed to ask or accept advice from Congress in dealing with the important problems affecting our relations with that country, and the lives and fortunes of American citizens residing there, but has used every means to prevent Congress from acting at all. He declined to recognize Huerta as President, who was the only pretender to that position who was selected therefor in the manner provided by the constitution of the country, and by the military invasion of the country, and by other means, drove him from power and banished him from his native country. He attempted at the same time to dictate to Mexico, as he has done to his own country, and control the elections to be held there, and making Huerta ineligible to election by the people of Mexico. He gave aid and comfort to Villa and Carranza, who were in actual and active rebellion against the constituted authority of their country, and to carry out his personal views and objects placed an embargo on the shipment of arms from this country to Mexico when it suited his aims and then removed it for the same reason. Having dethroned and banished Huerta by using this Nation for that purpose, and aiding and abetting parties in rebellion, when Carranza and Villa fell out he used all the powers of this country, short of actual intervention, to aid Villa, as great a scoundrel, murderer, bandit, and cutthroat as ever disgraced any country. He would undoubtedly have recognized him as head of the Government of Mexico had not Villa failed to develop the strength expected of him. Then, as Carranza, who was little if any better than Villa, looked to be the most available and likely man to control conditions, he recognized the former, who was without the shadow of legal or even moral claim to head the government, and appointed an ambassador to Mexico to represent this country at the court of Carranza, a mere pretender without the semblance of a government, and the United States Senate was weak enough to confirm the appointment.

The President has not only taken to himself all power and authority to deal with Mexico, but has ignored the constituted diplomatic representatives of this Government to that country, and sent there, without authority of law, "personal representatives of the President," not representatives of their country, and answerable to no governmental authority whatever. And it was through the advice of such personal representatives and not the regularly appointed diplomatic officers, but against their judgment and advice, that the President acted in that country as already pointed out and which has placed us, as a Nation, in a most humiliating position in the estimation of thinking and patriotic people in our own country and in the eyes of the whole civilized world. Twice has the President, without action on the part of Congress or any other legal authority, appointed commissioners to act with commissioners appointed by Carranza, who does not in any sense represent the Republic of Mexico or possess any authority to bind that country, to negotiate and settle our relations with Mexico. Nor has the President of the United States any more authority than has Carranza to appoint such a commission or to bind this country by any such negotiations.

The course of the President in Mexico has been one of arrogant and arbitrary, if not unlawful, exercise of power. He has taken no advice from any lawfully constituted power of his country except of his own selection and appointment and who were willing to submit to his arbitrary dictation. If he has acted within his power as Chief Magistrate of the country and, as such, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, it shows as clearly as experience could demonstrate the enormous, uncontrolled, and dangerous power of the President. If not within his constitutional powers, then it shows with startling clearness the dangers of the usurpation of power by the executive branch of the Government that should excite the lively apprehension of the American people.

Mr. President, I have given some conspicuous examples of the aggressions of the Executive and his encroachments upon the legislative department of the Government. They are only a few out of many. Indeed, it seems to have become understood not only by the President but by altogether too many of the people that the President is in every sense the head of the Government and that Congress and the courts are his subordinates and subject to his will and command. It is one of the worst features of the present unfortunate situation that this feeling should prevail throughout the country. Lamentable as it is, however, it is an undoubted fact. Many people seem to feel the greatest satisfaction at the domination of the President over Congress and his efforts to drive it to do his bidding.

Having said this much about the dangers and evil effects of usurpation of power by the President of the United States, let me call the attention of the Senate and the country to some other of the evils that threaten the perpetuity of our free institutions.

DEPARTMENT OF BUREAUCRATIC INTERFERENCE WITH LEGISLATION.

The endeavor to usurp and control the legislative functions of Congress is not by any means confined to the head of the executive department. The extent to which legislation is formulated and pushed through Congress and proposed legislation defeated through the activity and influence of the different executive departments is a standing reproach upon Congress. It has become the unfortunate and inexcusable custom of committees of both Houses to refer bills indiscriminately to the departments, not for any facts and information that the committees may need but for the judgment of the department as to the merits of the bill and an opinion as to whether it should be enacted into law. In this way the executive branch of the Government is, without warrant of law, made a strong, often controlling, influence in legislation.

An unfortunate Member of Congress who has upon his own judgment and responsibility introduced what he believes to be a meritorious bill often sees it defeated for the sole reason that, not the head of the department necessarily, but some head of a bureau or other subordinate executive employee has declared against it, and the next day that same Member may be unwise enough to attempt to secure the passage of another bill by calling attention to the fact that it has the approval of the department. The Member who appeals to such outside influence to secure the passage of any bill is entitled to no sympathy if other of his bills are defeated through the same illegitimate influences. But, even this, humiliating as it is, is not the worst of this situation. Committees which should be responsible for all bills reported favorably or adversely, in this convenient way shove that responsibility off on an irresponsible executive employee and report them with little consideration of their own, upon the favorable or unfavorable edict of this irresponsible and illegitimate authority. Very naturally, therefore, the report of a committee of this body is not considered sufficient upon which to act. It is a common thing, when a bill comes on for hearing on a favorable report of a committee, to hear a Senator inquire whether it has been approved by the department or not. If the answer is in the affirmative that is usually taken as entirely satisfactory and such bills, with very few exceptions, pass without question on that mere assurance, As a natural consequence United States Senators appeal to department or bureau heads and use their influence with them to induce them to approve their bills. It is a beautiful spectacle, is it not? Can anyone wonder that under such circumstances the people of the country are losing confidence in and respect for their Congress? Do Senators think that the American people, or the Congress itself, realize to what extent we have already become a bureaucratic Government with the Congress the servant of the executive department and not of the people; or how rapidly we are tending toward an autocratic if not a despotic Government?

This executive-department influence and control over legislation is only one evidence of our tendency toward national weakness and degeneracy, but it is a very serious one that should command public attention and speedy correction. The Congress of the United States should do its own legislating, independently, and be alone responsible for it. To refer legislation directly or indirectly to any other officer or body except for information is to abandon its functions and prerogatives and neglect its duties.

THE SECRET CAUCUS.

One of the worst of these evils is the secret caucus, the object and effect of which is to bind the will and fetter the freedom of action of members of a legislative body against their own conscientious convictions, and not infrequently in opposition to the wish and desire of their constituents. It is of the most vital importance that every lawmaker should be absolutely free and independent in his course and in his action upon any and every measure that may come before Congress, and that he shall have the moral courage to stand firmly for his own convictions subject only to accountability to his constituents for whatever he may do. The secret caucus destroys this independence and freedom of action and compels a Member of Congress to do not what his own judgment and conviction commends to him but what a majority of his colleagues may dictate. The whole system by which Members of Congress are subjected to such dictation by their associates is vicious, un-American, and unpatriotic. It is amazing that in this enlightened age, and in a free Republic like ours, any political party should resort to such an instrument to secure legislation. Of course, such a system is intended to enact laws by a minority as resort to it is wholly unnecessary to secure favorable action on any measure when the majority of the legislative body is for it.

Mr. President, to my mind the most dangerous feature of the secret caucus is its powerful aid and assistance to the usurpation of power by the President. This has been conspicuously evident for the past four years. Whenever a bill was announced as an administration measure, or that the President particularly desired its passage, and a majority was believed to be opposed to it, a binding caucus was resorted to to bind all Democrats to its support, thus coercing enough Members of the majority conscientiously opposed to the measure to secure its passage. First came the powerful presidential influence, exercised in violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution and the sacred principles of free popular government, and then the caucus that made his will supreme and binding on the consciences of the Members who were of his party. This unpatriotic means of coercing action by Congress can not be too strongly condemned. To hold such a caucus should be made a criminal offense and be severely punished, if the good sense and loyalty of Members of Congress are not sufficient to put an end voluntarily to a practice so clearly detrimental to the public interest.

INDIFFERENCE TO OFFICIAL DUTY AND OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. President, not the least of the dangerous tendencies of the times is the indifference to their duties and the obligations of their oaths of office on the part of the official representatives of the people. I need not go outside of this Chamber for striking illustrations of this tendency. This is sometimes denominated the greatest deliberative body in the world, and it should be so. It is one branch of the lawmaking power of a Nation of over a hundred millions of people. The destiny of this great Republic rests in its hands. No greater responsibility could be imposed upon any body of men. It calls for industry, integrity, and constant vigilance. And yet, sir, Members of this body absent themselves from their places here for days, weeks sometimes, and even for months without leave, and for no valid reason, and continue to draw the salary they do not earn, although there is a direct statutory provision that a Senator who absents himself without leave of the Senate shall forfeit his salary for the time of his absence. Again, the indifference of Senators to the proceedings of the Senate when not absent from the Capitol and nominally on duty is worthy of remark. Speeches are made here time after time on important, sometimes vital, questions to empty seats while Senators are enjoying themselves in the adjoining cloakrooms or otherwise engaged. I remember one occasion during the last session when I came into the Chamber and a Senator was delivering an address on an important measure. He had an audience in the Chamber of just five persons, the Vice President and four Senators, but no listeners. The Vice President was reading a newspaper with apparent interest and seemed to be totally oblivious to what was going on, and the four Senators present were engaged in private conversation and paying no attention whatever to what was being said by the Senator having the floor. This was not so extreme a case as might be supposed. It is not at all an unusual thing for a Senator to be addressing less than 10 Senators and receiving attention from none. What must the visitors in the galleries think of the great United States Senate that they have read about when they look down from the galleries upon such a scene? What would the American people think about it if they knew that the affairs of their country were being conducted or neglected in that way? What respect for and obedience to the laws have we a right to expect from a people whose laws are being made in that way by their representatives? We are all amenable to criticism on this ground. None of us have done our whole duty in this respect. No single Senator can point to his associates and say, "You did it, and I did not. You are responsible for this unfortunate condition and I am not." There are different degrees of neglect in this particular, but all are more or less guilty of the offense.

Mr. President, let me call attention to one other example or illustration of a want of attention of Senators to the proceedings of the Senate relating to questions upon which sooner or later they know they will be called upon to act. It is in the matter of hearings, investigations, and reports of committees. Many such hearings are held and reports made by committees of the Senate for the information and guidance of its Members. I have every reason to believe that such reports are very rarely even read by most of the Members of this body, and the evidence taken at the hearings even more rarely. I have one striking case of this kind in mind. At the session before the last a joint special committee of the two Houses was appointed to investigate and report upon the fiscal relations of the Government and the District of Columbia, that had been matter of dispute ever since I have been in the Senate. The committee spent two months in the hearing and investigation of this important matter. Afterwards, at the last session, the same matter again came up for consideration, and in the course of the debate upon it, when there was a large number of Senators present, I requested all who had read the report and hearings to make it known, and there were just five Members of this body who had read the reports, of which there were two, or parts of them, and none had read the hearings, and maybe one or two had read parts of the evidence taken. And, worst of all, members of the regular committee of the Senate who were called upon to report upon the bill involving the question submitted to the special committee for hearing and report had not read the hearings or the reports nor given them any attention.

Mr. President, I have only given instances of this indifference to duty on the part of the Senate. It is a common occurrence. Hundreds of like cases could be cited. These are melancholy confessions for a Member of this body to make, but I am dealing frankly with the weaknesses in the administration of the affairs of the Government, and this is one of them of no small consequence with which I, as a Member of this body, am personally familiar, and which I could not, if I desired to do so, consistently or fairly overlook. I hope it may soon be remedied, for the credit of the United States Senate and its Members and in the interests of the country. What I have said about the Senate will be found to prevail in greater or less degree in all branches of the Government.

UNDESIRABLE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. President, another of the degenerating tendencies downward is the admission into this country of millions of ignorant, criminal, and otherwise undesirable subjects of foreign nations. In some sections of the country these foreigners, many of whom do not speak our language, have become a dangerous and dominating force. They are admitted to citizenship with an alarming indifference to consequences, and their votes are coveted by politicians and candidates for office. They know and care but little about the laws and institutions of the country. Under the guidance and influence of designing labor organization leaders they become the backbone of labor strikes and are the first to resort to force and violence to make strikes successful. Thus they become the instruments and the victims of dangerous labor agitators. They have already come in such numbers as to make them a potent force in politics and are courted accordingly. This has gone further than any other consideration to prevent the enactment of such immigration laws as will effectively exclude them from entry into this country. Lawmakers are afraid of the naturalized labor vote.

Mr. President, this foreign element that has come into the country in swarms has become a dangerous and degenerating force that has reduced the standard of citizenship and undermined that respect for law and order which is so necessary to the preservation of a republican form of government. Violence and lawlessness resorted to as a means of redress of wrongs, or alleged denial of rights, lead inevitably to more arbitrary laws and centralization of government in the interest of one class as against another. A resort to force by the lower and more ignorant of our citizenry is an incentive to the building up of an aristocracy, an arbitrary form of government, and ultimately a despotism. This is a feature of present-day conditions that calls for most careful and patriotic consideration and a speedy remedy. And I maintain that the only effective remedy is the entire exclusion of such immigrants, I might say all immigrants of the laboring class at least, until we have assimilated and elevated to respectable and law-abiding citizens the enormous number that has already been admitted. The duty is imperative and should not be neglected or delayed.

This tendency toward degeneracy is not alone the fault of the immigrants. Native-born Americans, instead of raising the foreign element to what should be the American standard of living, too often allow the whole community of which the immigrant has become a considerable part to sink to the level of the lower foreign standard. They do not assimilate but isolate the foreign element in most of the cities and towns, thus building up foreign cities within what should be wholly American cities governed by American standards of living. When we add to this the fact that the foreign sections are as a rule inadequately supplied with facilities for healthful and sanitary living, such as a sufficient water supply, facilities for collection of garbage, sanitary homes, and other things necessary for right standards of living, we can not ascribe all of the deplorable conditions that exist to the immigrant class. They are too often made the victims of the greed and avarice of the landowners and the indifference and false economy of municipal bodies, from which the whole community suffers. Instead of elevating the immigrant to the American standard of living, we accept his own and leave him to believe that it is our standard. Thus we make conditions worse, instead of better, for all parties concerned.

It is the American as well as the unfortunate immigrant who needs to be regenerated and his standard of living elevated. We are being assimilated, instead of assimilating our foreign residents.

ONE TERM FOR THE PRESIDENT—LEADER OF HIS PARTY.

Mr. President, one of the weaknesses of the Constitution itself is that it permits the President to be a candidate for reelection during his term of office. Coupled with the present-day doctrine that when elected he becomes the head and leader of his party, his candidacy for a second term becomes more than ever objectionable and offensive. Indeed, as I have already pointed out, the unwarranted lengths to which the present Executive has gone in dictating and controlling legislation has been excused on the ground that in doing so he was not acting as President, but as the leader of his party. The idea that the President of the United States, or for that matter any executive officer, shall or may become the leader of any political party is, to my mind, obnoxious to every sense of propriety or decency, to say nothing of his spending his time in the service of a political party that should be devoted to the service of the general public. A man elected to the office of President of the United States should be the servant of the whole people, and not of those of one political faith. He should not be a political partisan. During the last Congress I introduced a resolution amending the Constitution in such way as to limit the service of the President to one term of six years. The Democratic Party in its platform, under which the present occupant of the White House was elected, declared in favor of a single term. In support of my proposed amendment I addressed the Senate, and in pointing out what I conceived to be some of the evil effects of allowing the President to have a second term, I had this to say, amongst other things:

> The effort to elect a President to a second term is a prolific source of political corruption, neglect of official duty, and betrayal of trust on the part of public servants. It is degrading to the President himself, and brings his great office into disrespect, often contempt. The President has come to be regarded as the head of his party, not as a candidate only but as President, and not as the head of the Nation. It is a most pernicious doctrine. He has the power of appointment of thousands of Federal officers in every part of the country. Practically, in making these appointments he acts as the head of his party and not as President. If he is reelected, the appointees may reasonably expect to retain their offices. A large part of his time that should be devoted to the public service is given over to politics and the effort to secure his reelection. He is regarded by his appointees as their political chief, to whom they owe allegiance because he appointed them. They are tempted to serve him rather than the country. He expects every man he appoints to support his political aspirations. To fail is to be treacherous and ungrateful. They so regard it, and so does he. The White House is turned into the headquarters of a political party, where a press bureau is maintained in the interest of the political chief and leader of his party who is for the time being the President of the United States. The members of his Cabinet become his political advisers. In this they are not serving their country, but the seeker after a second term. The appointees in the immediate service of the President become his political aids and devote much of their time, paid for by the Government, to his service as political leader and candidate for reelection. It is a vicious system that can not be denounced too strongly or too often. The people of a free Republic should not submit to it for a day. Every lover of his country should speak out against it and support any measure intended and reasonably calculated to put an end to it. If a President were limited to one term, and rendered ineligible to a second election, there would be no incentive or temptation to appoint men to office with a view to their support of him as a candidate for a second term. He would need no political army. As a political leader he would be useless. He would have no motive or desire other than to do his duty as President and make for himself an honorable record as a public official.

This amendment to limit the President to one term was passed by the Senate by a vote of 47 to 23, a majority of more than two-thirds. Of the votes in favor of the amendment, 27 were Democratic votes and 19 Republican. There would have been a still larger vote for the amendment but for differences as to the form of the amendment involving the respective rights of the Federal Government and the States to regulate and control the elections. On the single question of confining the service of the President to a single term the Senate was then, and I believe is now, overwhelmingly in favor of such limitation.

I can add but little to what I said on the occasion to which I have referred. But, sir, subsequent events have confirmed my convictions on the subject and demonstrated the wisdom of making it impossible for any man to be a candidate a second time for this great office which has been degraded in the past four years more than I can tell by the exhibition of partisan politics in the White House and the excesses to which the President has gone in the effort to serve his party and secure his own reelection. While repudiating his party platform declaring in favor of a single term, and defying the sentiment of his party as evidenced by the decisive vote of Democratic Senators in support of the proposed amendment, he has, by his own conduct, given the country a convincing object lesson of the evils of a second term that should insure the adoption of such an amendment in the near future. It is a remarkable fact that of the 23 votes cast against the amendment confining the President to one term only 2 were Democratic votes. So the present incumbent of the office became a candidate for a second term when the platform under which he was elected the first time declared against it and after the representatives of his party in the United States Senate had voted 27 to 2 in favor of a single term. Comment on such a situation would seem to be unnecessary. The Democratic plank of the platform of 1912 was as follows:

We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

It will be seen that the President's party not only declared in favor of a single term but pledged the candidate of the convention to that principle. To be a candidate for a second term under such circumstances was not only to violate the pledge of his party by which he should have held himself bound but was undoubtedly in opposition to the sentiment of a large majority of the people of the country. The President, as a candidate, made no objection to this pledge binding both him and his party to a single term, but accepted it and had the benefit of this platform declaration, knowing that it was popular and would make him votes. But almost immediately after his election and before he came into office he repudiated it, in express and unqualified terms, in a letter written by him to Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, then a Member of the House of Representatives, in which he said:

A fixed constitutional limitation to a single term of office is highly arbitrary and unsatisfactory from every point of view. I believe that we should fatally embarrass ourselves if we made the constitutional change proposed.

It is a significant fact worthy of notice that this commendable pledge in favor of a single presidential term was carefully omitted from the Democratic platform of 1916, which, it is generally understood, was written by the President himself, and that no further effort to adopt the proposed amendment was made.

Hon. Hannis Taylor, who has had large experienced in public life, who has represented his Government as ambassador to Spain, and is a lifelong Democrat, in a letter to the national business men's Republican committee of New York, of date September 5, 1916, justly characterized the course of the President when he says:

Did he strive to secure the adoption of the amendment, or did he deliberately and actively intrigue to defeat it? Let the answer to that question come from his able and experienced advocate and apologist, Mr. George Harvey, who in attempting to make a case for him in the North American Review for February, 1916, made instead admissions that render all future attempts to defend him hopeless. Mr. Harvey said: "But after the election of Mr. Wilson upon a platform pledging the candidate to 'the principle' avowed, the proposition was revived in the Senate, and on February 1, 1913, it was adopted by that body, 17 anti-Roosevelt Republicans voting affirmatively and only 1 Democrat—Mr. Shively, of Indiana—voting in the negative. The sentiment of the House was overwhelmingly in favor of the resolution, but the Democratic leaders, feeling that their newly elected President was entitled to consultation upon a matter of so much importance and having no late information respecting his attitude, deferred action until his views could be ascertained. * * * Meanwhile the President elect intervened in the letter to Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer, dated February 12, which was duly exhibited to Chairman Clayton and other prominent Representatives, who promptly bowed to the wish of their new leader and buried the resolution."

"For more than 30 years I have made a special study of our complex American Constitution; for the last 14 years I have lived at Washington, where I have watched its practical workings day by day, just as a machinist might watch the movements of a Corliss engine. In the light of that study and experience I do not hesitate to say that, in my humble judgment, the greatest defect in our National Constitution, that brings more evils to the people than all others combined, is represented by the lack of that amendment prohibiting a second term which Mr. Wilson's selfish ambition has for the moment defeated. His almost insane desire to succeed himself has deprived him of the power to be really useful at a critical moment in our history. His ceaseless pursuit of that will-o'-the-wisp, called a second terms, has led him into all kinds of bogs and morasses; it has entangled him in hopeless inconsistencies; it has put him on both sides of nearly every public question; it has forced him to do things no other public man would have dared to do. The typical illustration, of course, is his sudden and violent change of front as to the exemption of American vessels from tolls in a canal built by American brains and American money through American territory.

And to show that the President was fully committed to the one-term plank of his party Mr. Taylor makes the following quotations from Mr. Bryan, then the accredited representative of the President as a candidate:

At a great meeting held at Indianapolis on October 17, 1912, Mr. Bryan said:

"We present him [Mr. Wilson] not only qualified in every way but we present him pledged to a single term, that he may be your President and spend no time dividing patronage in order to secure delegates; that he need spend no time in planning for reelection; that he may give you all his thought and all his heart and all his energy. I believe that when a man is lifted by his countrymen to this pinnacle of power he ought to tear from his heart every thought of ambition and on his bended knees consecrate his term to his country's service. That is our ideal President, and we present to you a man who measures up to that ideal."

William Henry Harrison, President of the United States, saw the effects of this evil, and in his inaugural address, delivered as far back as 1841, condemned it in unmeasured terms.

PATRONAGE—POLITICAL SUBSERVIENCY IN LEGISLATION.

The effect of patronage or appointments to office by the President is touched upon by President Harrison in his inaugural address to which I have already referred. He says, in part:

To a casual observer our system presents no appearance of discord between the different members which compose it. Even the addition of many new ones has produced no jarring. They move in their respective orbits in perfect harmony with the central head and with each other. But there is still an undercurrent at work by which, if not seasonably checked, the worst apprehensions of our anti-Federal patriots will be realized, and not only will the State authorities be overshadowed by the great increase of power in the executive department of the General Government but the character of that Government, if not its designation, be essentially and radically changed. This state of things has been in part effected by causes inherent in the Constitution and in part by the never-failing tendency of political power to increase itself. By making the President the sole distributor of all the patronage of the Government the framers of the Constitution do not appear to have anticipated at how short a period it would become a formidable instrument to control the free operations of the State government. Of trifling importance at first, it had early in Mr. Jefferson's administration become so powerful as to create great alarm in the mind of that patriot from the potent influence it might exert in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise. If such could have then been the effects of its influence, how much greater must be the danger at this time, quadrupled in amount as it certainly is and more completely under the control of the Executive will than their construction of their powers allowed or the forbearing characters of all the early Presidents permitted them to make.

The undercurrent to which this distinguished citizen refers has not been checked. On the contrary, it has grown in volume and has become a most powerful means of extending and making effective the growing usurpation of power by the President. One can not but wonder what President Harrison could or would have done to remedy this great and growing evil influence and others mentioned and condemned in his inaugural address if he had been spared to serve out his term. Would he have made good his pledge not to be a candidate for a second term, or would he have succumbed to the temptation of further personal ambition and violated that pledge as the present occupant of the White House has violated both his own and his party's pledge? As his term of service was cut short by death within a few days after his inauguration, we can only speculate as to what would have been his future course.

Mr. President, my opposition to the present system of dispensing patronage is not founded alone upon the ground that it unduly increases the power of the President, which is reason enough to condemn it. Worse than this is its demoralizing effect upon the lawmaking branch of the Government. One of the, to me, unaccountable weaknesses of human nature is that the Members of Congress regard the privilege of recommending appointments to office from their States as of value to them personally and politically. It is this singular desire to control appointments to office that makes the appointing power of the President so powerful, so dangerous, and so degrading in its effects. We all know that this weapon, in the hands of the Executive, has been used in times past, sometimes mercilessly, to coerce Members of Congress to bow to his will; and, worse than all, we know that it has been used effectively for that purpose. It is a humiliating fact, but that it is a fact no well-informed man will dispute. It is not only the threat of the President to ignore Members of Congress in making appointments or refusal to accede to their claim of right under custom to name the appointees in their States that brings results. It is the knowledge that the President has the power to appoint against their wishes and recommendation that terrifies some timid Members of Congress into submission to Executive demands. The whole system as now practiced is corrupting and degrading to both the legislative and executive departments of the Government.

At the last Congress I introduced a bill providing for the appointment by the President, at the beginning of his term of office, of a commission to receive and consider all applications and recommendations for appointments to office and report to the President for appointment the best fitted of the applicants for each office and forbidding any Member of Congress or of the President's Cabinet applying for or recommending the appointment of anyone.

The chief object of the bill was to remove from the Halls of Congress the temptations and evil effects of the patronage system. But, at the same time, it would have saved the President the enormous and thankless burden of considering thousands of applications for appointments and in great measure have removed from him both the temptation and the opportunity to use the powers of appointment for coercive or other ulterior purposes. One would have supposed that every Member of this body would have welcomed the opportunity of relieving himself from the burdens and evil effects of patronage, but the bill introduced by me was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate and by that committee reported adversely without even giving me the opportunity of a hearing upon it. The system of patronage now prevailing, the creature of custom and not of law, is one of the most pernicious, degrading, corrupting, and dangerous evils of the many that are now eating at the vitals of our free institutions. It is one of the most potent causes of political and official subserviency to Executive power and coercion, and serves as much, perhaps, as any other cause to destroy the independence and usefulness of the legislative branch of the Government and to bring it into general disrepute and contempt. It is something with which no Member of Congress should be allowed to have anything to do. The power of appointment is vested by the Constitution in the President. He has no right to barter it away to Members of Congress. When he does it is too apt to be, and generally is, for a consideration. It is extended as a favor and for this favor the Member of Congress to whom it is extended is expected to support and carry out the wishes of the President.

My views on this subject will be found more fully stated in an extract from the speech delivered by me on "One year of Democratic rule," already quoted. I need not repeat. It is a subject about which I feel very strongly. I hope the time will soon come when this body will free itself forever from the unfortunate and corrupting influences of the present system of selecting men for office.

USE OF MONEY IN ELECTIONS.

The means by which men secure their election to office may generally be taken as a fair indication of what their standard of official life and duty will be if they succeed. One of the crying evils of present-day politics is the use of inordinately large sums of money in the elections of all officers from the President of the United States down. Money, rightly used, is a good thing if one or a few men do not have too much of it, but in politics and elections it is a corrupting and demoralizing influence. Much of the large sums of money expended in this way is not used directly for the corruption of voters, but a great deal of it is used in such way as to be deceptive, misleading, and a fraud on the voters. Perhaps the greater part of the money expended in political campaigns is for what is politely termed publicity.

Enormous sums are spent in this way by committees and individual candidates. Newspapers, some of them so-called leading newspapers of the country, are subsidized, purchased for money, to say things favorable to parties and candidates that they would not say of their own free will, and things which they themselves do not believe. Commendations of this kind, paid for by a candidate, go out to the public as the real sentiments of the newspaper, magazine, or other publication, thus deceiving the voters who may rely upon what their newspapers say. This is not only dishonest on the part of both the newspaper and the candidate, but is a fraud upon the voter. No candidate who has a due appreciation of the sacredness of the franchise in a government of the people or of the duties of a public official will ever resort to subsidized newspaper publicity to secure an election to any office, high or low. But the fraudulent and misleading character of this method of getting votes is not its only objectionable feature. It has, most unfortunately, become generally understood that a man can not be elected a member of this body without the expenditure of large sums of money. While this is not wholly true, and many Senators are elected with but little expense and that entirely legitimate, it is altogether too true that many others are elected by that very means and, generally speaking, they are men who should never be elected to any high office of trust and great responsibility. I was informed by one who knew, and upon whom I could rely, that one of the candidates for United States Senator in my State at the last election sought to secure the services of a publicity man, so called, of experience in that kind of work, to conduct that particular part of his campaign. He was told that to conduct such a campaign would cost not less than $25,000 and that the man who was asked to undertake it would not do so until that sum was placed in his hands. At the next previous election I witnessed the humiliating spectacle of candidates for the Senate being advertised, their virtues exploited in the newspapers for pay, and their pictures, large and loud, plastered on billboards, barns, and fences throughout the State with accompanying self-praise and commendation. One candidate went to the vulgar extreme of advertising himself by revolving electric signs blazoning his candidacy and his qualifications to his admiring political friends. I was informed by one of his political friends and his supporter that the campaign of this candidate cost him not less than $300,000.

Mr. President, no man who will or has resorted to such methods to secure his election is fit to be a Member of this body. He is no true American. He is lacking in the moral sense that high public position demands. He has no conception or appreciation of American citizenship or the duties and responsibilities of this great office. Of course, he could not spend this sum of money openly and in his own name. If he did, it would bring him within the terms of the corrupt-practices act. I have never seen the affidavit of expenditures made by the candidate to whom I have referred, but I have no doubt it showed an expenditure within the limitation fixed by law. Indeed, the corrupt-practices act seems to be more a premium for perjury than anything else.

Mr. President, these questionable and illegitimate, not to say unlawful, methods of securing elections to office are not confined to elections of United States Senators. They extend to all kinds of offices, even that of judges. That elections can be controlled and men elected to offices of trust and responsibility in this way is a distinct and dangerous menace to free government. It would be little worse to put up the offices for sale to the highest bidder without regard to his merits or his qualifications. In many instances the offices are now bought, practically and in effect.

Mr. President, this alarming and demoralizing evil is well known by all observing people and sincerely deplored by many. But so far public sentiment has not been strong enough to put an end to it. If all good people who believe in honesty and decency in politics would set their faces against such practices and had the patriotism and moral courage to vote against any and every man who resorted to such methods, it would help to remedy the evil, but it would not always be effective, because, in many instances, both opposing candidates will be equally guilty and choice must be made between two men, both of whom should be defeated. If, again, candidates for office only had the moral courage, good sense, and patriotism to stand out against the temptation to spend money in such way to secure their election and refuse to be bled by corrupt newspapers, the remedy would be effective. But it is at once said that if one does it the other must, and if one candidate is decent enough to stand on his own merits, without false and misleading publicity and other exploitation, he will be defeated and the indecent man with plenty of money will be elected by this vulgar and degrading brand of politics. And, sir, this is altogether too true in the main. The average voter does not appreciate the enormity of such campaigning. He rather likes it. If the candidate does not spend his money freely he is criticized and voted against for that very reason.

Then, sir, what is the remedy? How is this flagrant offense against the elective franchise to be prevented? In my opinion there is but one effective way, and that is to make it unlawful for a candidate to spend any money at all to secure his election, or anyone to pay it for him, except a fixed sum to be paid to the State or county, and for that payment the State or county should print and send out to each voter a statement of the qualifications and fitness of each candidate furnished by him within reasonable limits. This would put every candidate, rich or poor, on an equal footing and put an end to purchased newspaper and other illegitimate and misleading publicity. Of course the candidate should be allowed to pay his ordinary personal traveling expenses, if any, in making his campaign, and nothing more, to be itemized and reported under oath and subject to the pains and penalties of perjury. This may seem to be a drastic remedy, but this widespread evil is one that calls for drastic treatment; and it will not only serve to purify elections and protect the franchise but will be a protection and relief to candidates for office.

EXTRAVAGANCE IN APPROPRIATIONS—PORK-BARREL LEGISLATION.

Mr. President, another of the present-day growing evils tending toward national weakness, decay, and final dissolution is the enormous and extravagant expenditure of the people's money, much of it useless and much more of it unwarranted and illegitimate. The appropriations last year amounted to considerably more than a billion and a half dollars. A small portion of this amount, comparatively speaking, was appropriated for the increase of the Army and Navy, which, to my mind, was an unnecessary expenditure, to say nothing worse of it; but leaving that out of the account the balance of the expenditure is an enormous sum to be paid for operating the Government. And when we take into account the sums of public money spent by the separate States for governmental purposes, the money it costs to operate and maintain the Government of the Union of States is nothing short of appalling.

But, Mr. President, if these expenditures on the part of the Government were necessary or even legitimate the people would have far less reason to complain of the heavy burden of taxes thus imposed upon them. Many of them are not. Millions of dollars are appropriated every year out of Government revenues that should be paid by the States. As I shall show more specifically further along, such appropriations are not only illegitimate but the making of them is gradually depriving the States of their independence and sovereignty and making them dependents upon the Federal Government, thus eliminating the division of sovereign power between the Government and the States. Besides, by this means, much of the work done is duplicated and paid for twice by the State and the Government.

In this connection it will not be out of place to say something about what has come to be called "pork-barrel legislation." It is not necessary to say much about it in this presence. The extent and the evils of it are too well known in this body to call for discussion, and one feels like holding his nose when he approaches the subject. It is a sordid, malodorous evil that has no excuse, much less justification. It is a rank injustice to the taxpayers of the country that has no excuse. It is found in its worst form in the river and harbor, Agricultural, and public buildings appropriation bills, but it abounds in other places and costs the people millions of dollars worse than uselessly expended.

Turning to what may properly be called legitimate but extravagant and unnecessary expenditures, the conditions are not much better. This tendency toward extravagant expenditures is not to be charged up against any one political party. It is a constantly growing evil and where it will end no one can tell. The Democratic Party very properly declared against it in its platform of 1912, in which it said:

> We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a Democratic Government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

Unfortunately this, like several other of its party pledges, was broken and the appropriations under this administration have gone far beyond that of any other since the formation of the Government.

Mr. President, I can not go into details in dealing with this question. It is unnecessary that I should, as the facts are well known to Members of this body, and I am taking up too much of the time of the Senate. But let me call attention to just one of the means of expending, yes, wasting, the public moneys. Take the example of creating commissions and investigating committees with large and increased salaries and heavy incidental expenses. Again I can not enter into details. Let me, however, quote briefly from a speech of Mr. GILLETT in the House, delivered near the close of the last session of Congress. He said in part:

> Applying their own standard and logic the session just closing far surpasses in extravagance any predecessor. The total appropriations of this one session amount to $1,626,439,209.63. In addition the Executive is authorized to incur obligations for $231,945,275.20, so that the whole amount of appropriations and obligations amounts to $1,858,384,484.83.
> The largest appropriations ever made in one session of a Republican Congress were $1,044,401,857.12 for the fiscal year 1910. This session exceeds that by $582,037,352.51.
> According to the rule applied to us for 14 years by the Democrats, they have been extravagant far beyond all precedent. If we are extravagant, they have been profligate.
> Last year the Democratic Party was extravagant according to their own standard. Yet the increase of the appropriation of money this year over last year is $511,502,197.61. The increase in the appropriation in money and contracts authorized this year over last year is $706,047,472.81.
> If there be eliminated from consideration in each year the sums devoted to national defense, it leaves for the ordinary civil functions of the Government $843,537,505.01 last year and $940,729,386.54 this year, an increase of $97,191,871.50, or 11½ per cent for a single year, and that at a time when we were compelled to make extraordinary expenditures for an emergency, and the most stringent economy was imperative for current expenses.
> During the Sixty-third Congress, covering the first two years of President Wilson's administration, pledged by its platform to reduce offices, the salary roll of the Government was increased by 7,033 statutory places, with salaries aggregating annually $7,769,585.12. This is the net increase. The gross increase was more than twice as large. And, in addition, lump-sum appropriations, used solely for the payment of employees, were increased $9,756,142.60, the number of employees and the rates of compensation being discretionary with the heads of departments. This would make the total net increase in number of offices at least 15,000. That payment out of lump sums is a system of employment which Congress for years had been endeavoring to diminish, because it engendered extravagance and favoritism. During the same period the net number of salaries increased reached 367, involving an annual increase of pay of $65,416.33.
> It is impossible to segregate yet the new places created in this session, but they will certainly far outnumber those created in the whole of the last Congress. From the best information I can get I estimate the whole number of new offices since the beginning of this administration at from 35,000 to 40,000.
> Among the new places created were 5, at $12,000 each; 6, at $10,000 each; 2, at $8,000 each; 1, at $7,500; 1, at $7,200; 7, at $6,000 each; 4, at $5,000 each; 3, at $4,500 each; and 4, at $4,000 each. At the present session by special enactment, 4 more, at $10,000 each; 6, at $7,500 each; 1, at $5,000; and 3, at $4,000 each, have been created, and the multitude of others created since last December, in annual appropriation acts, in lump sums, and otherwise, at salaries varying from the paltry sum of $5,000 down, it will take time and research, after the session has closed, to determine—their number will run into the thousands.
> One salary was increased from $5,000 to $12,000; 3, from $12,000 to $17,500 each; and 1, from $7,000 to $9,000.

In this speech, Mr. GILLETT goes into particulars. To quote them would take up too much time and space. It is a revelation that should open the eyes of the American people to the perils of this fast-growing and consuming evil.

GROWING POWER OF MONEY.

The large increase of the wealth of the country accumulated in the hands of a few inordinately rich men and powerful corporations is a standing menace to popular government that is growing in power and force. I am afraid the people of this country have but little conception of the extent to which this threatening and powerful influence has assumed control of elections and legislation. It is a subtle power working under cover, but everywhere present when its interests are likely to be affected, and operating secretly wherever possible, and through able and skillful agents who know what their principals want. The control that these powerful influences have exercised over elections and the affairs of government has resulted in class divisions and class legislation most detrimental to a free republic. As I am trying to point out the evils that are confronting the country I refer to this most powerful and potent one only in a general way that it may not be overlooked. While I am devoting but little time to it, I regard it as one of the most serious and dangerous forces of evil that is now threatening our republican form of government.

THE INCREASED POWER OF THE MILITARY.

I refer also to the increased and increasing power of the military as inimical to free government. It has proven, as history teaches us, to be one of the great causes of the decay and downfall of other nations once as powerful and seemingly as secure as our own. The war in Europe has excited the fears of the American people and aroused an unfortunate military spirit that is much to be deplored. This unhappy condition of the public mind, manufactured largely by interested parties, especially the great corporations dealing in arms and munitions of war, acting upon Congress and forcing it to action resulted in laws enacted at the last session greatly increasing both the Army and Navy. So persistently and shrewdly was the public mind played upon and the fears of the people engendered that many unthinking people came to look upon this increase of our military strength as a patriotic duty, and the proposed increase became popular in the minds of many good people who did not and do not believe in war or a large Military Establishment. This perversion of the public mind, this creation of a belief in a large standing army in the minds of our people is one of the worst and most dangerous features of the situation. Let us hope that the American people may soon be restored to their right mind on this subject and that we may never have a large and dominating military force in this country. I hope any apprehensions that I or any other citizen may have on the subject may prove to be unfounded. But no thinking man can conceal from himself the fact that we have taken a long and dangerous step toward militarism, one of the greatest enemies of free and popular government.

History proves that there is no more arrogant or dominating power than that of the military. It is the representative of force and not of law. When it comes into action the laws of civil and orderly government are suspended or destroyed and arbitrary power, armed force, takes its place. I know that it is claimed that this can not happen in this country. But human nature is much the same the world over and it has happened more than once in other countries. Indeed, it has happened, and that in the most aggravated and lawless forms, in some of the States in our own country. Martial law in times of peace is not unknown in the United States, and it is a power to be dreaded by any nation or any people.

THE JUDICIARY IN POLITICS.

Mr. President, I have had occasion heretofore to express my views on the subject of the election of judges to political offices. In a speech delivered by me in this body April 12, 1916, in speaking of the Supreme Court of the United States, I said, in part:

To my mind it is of the gravest importance that that great tribunal should be separated absolutely and forever from politics, candidacy for office, or any interest in elections beyond that of the disinterested and patriotic private citizen.

But my objections to judicial officers becoming candidates for any other office are not confined to that great court. They apply with equal force to all judges, State and National. In some of the States, be it said to their credit, a judge is forbidden by law to be a candidate for any other office during the term for which he was elected. Unfortunately, it is held that this inhibition does not apply where the judge is a candidate for a Federal office; for example, United States Senator. There may be cases of extreme exigency where the salutary rule that I am contending for might with justice and propriety be violated in the public interest, but such cases must be exceedingly rare. Members of the Supreme Court have spoken at different times, urging in no uncertain terms the impropriety of themselves being candidates for President of the United States. Thus Chief Justice Waite, when asked to be a candidate for President, had this to say:

Of course, I am always grateful to my friends for any effort in my behalf, and no one ever had those more faithful or indulgent. But do you think it quite right for one occupying the first judicial position in the land to permit the use of his name for a political position? The office came to me covered with honor, and when I accepted it my chief duty was not to make it a stepping-stone to something else but to preserve its purity, and, if possible, make my name as honorable as that of my predecessors. No man ought to accept this place unless he shall take a vow to leave it as honorable as he found it. There ought never to be any necessity for rebuilding from below. All additions should be above. In my judgment, the Constitution might wisely have prohibited the election of a Chief Justice to the Presidency. Entertaining such a view, could I properly or consistently permit my name to be used for the promotion of a political combination as now suggested? If I should do so, could I at all times and in all cases remain an unbiased judge in the estimation of the people?

Under like circumstances Mr. Justice Hughes expressed similar lofty sentiments, as follows:

The Supreme Court must not be dragged into politics. A judge of the Supreme Court should not be available, though he is nominally eligible, for elective offices. The moment he assumes the judicial office he ceases to be a partisan and knows, or should know, no partisan obligation. The moment he accepts a party nomination one or more things happen and happen explicitly.

First, a political party may undertake to capitalize the judicial decisions of its candidate than which nothing could be more deeply violative of the spirit of the judicial institution. His decisions would, moreover, become subject to the partisan and passionate review of partisan strife. Worst of all, it is not inconceivable that, if men are to step from the bench to elective office, decisions may ultimately be rendered with a view to the contingency of such public and necessarily partisan review.

Such a situation would be certain to lessen the independence of the judiciary, as it would inevitably impair the Nation's confidence in the unswerving integrity of the court. Of what real and permanent value were the decisions of a judge to-day who on the morrow may choose or be chosen to sue for the favor and suffrage of the electorate?

More important than the outcome of the present political contest, however large it looms at present, is the perpetuating of the organic institutions or sovereignty of the Republic. One such institution coordinate with the executive and legislative is the judicial. The people rightly believe in the integrity and the incorruptibility of the Supreme Bench. The justices of the Supreme Court of the United States are privileged by virtue of their office to render service of the highest order to the Nation.

The performance of that service and the maintenance of the dignity of that office depends in largest part upon the will of the members of that court to suffer no personal ambition for elective office, however great their gifts, and though their fitness be in every other respect beyond question, to influence their judgment or to affect the attitude of the Nation to the Supreme Court as a tribunal, which, without personal aims and above private ambition, seeks to interpret the law upon the basis of the Constitution of the United States. * * *

I hope that as a justice of the Supreme Court I am rendering public service and may continue to do so for some years; but the Supreme Court must not be dragged into politics, and no man is as essential to his country's well-being as is the unstained integrity of the courts.

And Mr. Justice Miller, another distinguished member of the court, refused, in 1876, to be a candidate for the Presidency for the same reasons.

Notwithstanding the strong sentiments of the judges themselves against their being candidates for political offices, it is not an uncommon thing to see judges running for other offices not only during the terms for which they were elected but during the term of their actual and active service on the bench and without even resigning their judicial positions.

Mr. President, to me this is an unpardonable offense. It should be expressly forbidden by law in the Government as it is in a number of the States, and this not alone because of the impropriety of dragging the courts into politics but for the better and stronger reason that it tends to break down the constitutional barriers between the different departments of government and thus destroy one of the greatest safeguards to the liberties of the people and the maintenance of our republican form of government.

CAMPAIGNING FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

Mr. President, it will be a sad day for the people of this Republic when they lose their respect for the office of President of the United States and cease to look upon it as sacredly and disinterestedly devoted to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, free from selfish ambitions and political or personal self-seeking. The dignity of this great office must be maintained and its independence preserved and defended against the degrading influences of party strife and the ambitions of the seeker after office and personal gain. As I have said, when a citizen is elected President he should cease to be a politician or partisan and become the servant of the whole people. I go further than that, Mr. President. I maintain that no man should seek this great office or as a candidate become the advocate of his own election or the success of his party. Time was when the impropriety, to say no worse of it, of a candidate for President taking the stump in the campaign for his election was fully recognized and observed. It was very generally looked upon as beneath the dignity of the office and unworthy of the candidate.

But, sir, this high ideal has become a thing of the past. By degrees the candidates for the Presidency have become more and more active in support of their own election, until at the last campaign we witnessed the unhappy and undignified spectacle of the several candidates for the Presidency, including the incumbant of the office seeking reelection, traveling the country over making political speeches, feasting at banquets, indulging in criminations and recriminations against each other, and practicing all the arts of the politician to secure the success of their respective parties and their own election. It was not an inspiring or elevating exhibition. I hope the American people will never be called upon to witness such another scene. It has been my conviction always that no candidate for President should engage in the campaign for his own election. It shows a lamentable lack of appreciation of the dignity and high character of the office and of the duties and obligations an election imposes upon the successful candidate.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the whole tendency of the times is to cheapen, belittle, and degrade this exalted position. The President is expected to travel about the country making a public show of himself, deliver addresses on all sorts of subjects, and make a common lyceum bureau of his office instead of performing the legitimate duties of his office, and the extent to which occupants of the office have responded to this unseemly demand upon their time and attention has been rather shocking to me, and it is an evil that is growing in extent year after year. My conception of the exalted office of President of the United States is such that to use it for such commonplace purposes is offensive to my sense of the proprieties, to say nothing more of it, and is calculated to bring the office into disrespect and contempt.

CLASS LEGISLATION.

Mr. President, another of the dangerous tendencies of the times is the disposition of Congress to legislate in favor of certain classes of citizens to the exclusion of other classes. This is conspicuously true of the farmers and the labor organizations of the country. There is no reason whatever for singling out these interests and favoring them by any legislation enacted for their especial benefit. They do not need special legislation in their behalf, and if they did, to single them, or either of them, out for such special and class legislation is vicious and in violation of the principle that all men are equal under our laws and form of government. The farmers of the country, who should be and are the most independent and patriotic of our citizens, should rise up in indignant opposition to the use that is being made of their names and their interests in aid of extravagant and useless appropriations and unnecessaray legislation, ostensibly for their protection and benefit, but in fact to secure their political support and their votes. The same thing may be said of the laboring class. The whole thing is nauseating to one who believes in legislating uniformly for all classes, without distinction or favoritism. The object of such legislation is transparently evident when we read the platforms of the different parties, in which they boastingly refer to what they have done for the farming and laboring classes.

Mr. President, time and space will not allow me to go into the details of such legislation, but I may mention in a general way the exemption of farmers and labor organizations from injunctive remedies that may be resorted to as against all other citizens; appropriations for good roads in the States, avowedly for the benefit of the farmers; rural-credit legislation, in the same interests; the eight-hour law passed at the last session under duress and without investigation; appropriations for fertilizer plants for the benefit of the farmers, and innumerable items of appropriations in the agricultural and other appropriation bills made for the especial benefit of farmers and other specific classes of people, many of them extravagant and unnecessary and only to secure the good will and political support of such classes.

Mr. President, there is no objection to legislation in favor of the farmers, the laboring men, or any other class of citizens if that legislation is at the same time for the benefit of the people generally. For example, if an eight-hour day is in the interest of the public and not alone of one class, to the detriment of the general public, there is no reason why it should not be enforced by law, if that is necessary. But this is not the theory upon which such laws are enacted. They are avowedly enacted for the benefit of a class without regard to their effect upon the people of the country as a whole, and the boast of the political parties is that they have been enacted for that purpose.

Any law that singles out any class of citizens and favors that class alone without regard to its effect upon the people generally is vicious, un-American, and inexcusable, and any law that exempts one class of citizens from the effects of a law and deprives other citizens of a civil remedy against that class that they may enforce against others destroys the uniformity of our laws, violates the principle of equality so necessary under our system of government, and can find no justification whatever. It is unjust legislation and dangerous in its effects. It is peculiarly dangerous because it incites in the minds of the favored class the belief and understanding that they are a favored class under the laws of the country and entitled to favors and protection not accorded to other people.

POLITICS IN LEGISLATION.

Mr. President, let me now call attention very briefly to the unmitigated evil of mixing legislation and partisan politics. In too many cases laws are not passed or defeated on their merits as legislation, but because of their political effect. Hardly a law of any importance is enacted by Congress without taking into account its probable effect upon one political party or another, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is full of political and partisan speeches that should never be heard in legislative halls. They breed bad legislation, lower the dignity and usefulness of a lawmaking body, and excite the distrust and contempt of all right-thinking patriotic citizens. Political parties are proper and necessary under our system of government, but their influence should be confined to political purposes and objects, and should not be used to secure or defeat legislation of a nonpartisan character, and no legislation should ever be enacted in the interest of a political party or for partisan purposes.

Again referring to the inaugural address of President Harrison, we find him opposing in strong language the prevailing system of patronage. His were wise and patriotic sentiments, expressed by a patriotic citizen just elevated to the exalted position of Chief Magistrate of this great Republic. It was a solemn occasion. What was then said should challenge the attention of every lover of his country. The warning conveyed in this message has not been heeded. Conditions in this respect have grown worse instead of better since that time. This partisan spirit that now enters so largely into legislation by Congress is the outcome of the vicious and unpatriotic doctrine that the President of the United States is the leader of his party and to the victor belongs the spoils, enforced by our unpardonable system of patronage to which I have already referred.

RELIGION IN POLITICS.

Mr. President, absolute and complete separation of church and state is one of the fundamental principles of our Government. Freedom of religious beliefs and practices is protected by the Constitution. Congress is expressly forbidden to legislate "respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." It is just as necessary that Government and all civic affairs should be kept free from religious or church influence or control as that freedom of religious belief and exercise should be sacredly preserved and protected. It is one of the threatening evils of the times that this important fact is not recognized or the principle that church and state shall be kept separate observed. As a natural and inevitable consequence we are threatened with a religio-political war, the tendency of which is to disturb the harmony of our civic institutions and the disruption and final overthrow of our free institutions and the destruction of the salutary principle of religious freedom.

In times past and even down to the present time in greater or less degree, in other countries, the church has exercised itself not in its religion alone, which is protected by our Constitution, but in secular affairs as well. The power of religious organizations over civic and governmental affairs in some of those countries has been greatly curtailed in later times and their influence more nearly confined to their legitimate powers and functions as religious organizations. As a result it is seen, with no little apprehension, that this great power, either through organization or membership, is exerting every effort to extend its influence in this country in secular affairs, evidenced by the strenuous and to a great extent successful efforts to secure appointments to office and places of power and influence in secular and governmental affairs in the interest of religion. The American people should not look with tolerance upon this effort through religious and church influence to secure places that may in time give over to any religious body the control of civic affairs over which no church or religious body should as such have any influence or control.

Mr. President, what I have said is not inspired by any antagonism toward any particular church, its religion, or any of its members. My opposition to the influence of religion in politics is applicable to every church or religious body. No church, whatever its religious teachings, can be allowed control over civic or governmental affairs. No citizen, however worthy, should be elevated to any official position because of his religious beliefs or opinions or in the interest of his church or its religious beliefs or practices. Neither should he be debarred from holding office or participating in public affairs because of his religious beliefs. His rights, his duties, and his obligations, both as a citizen of this Republic and as one of its officers, should be wholly apart from and kept separate from his religious beliefs and his duties and obligations to his church, should there be any conflict between the two. His duty as a public official is to his country and not to his religion or his church.

The wisdom of this separation of church and state is fully attested by the history and experience of other countries. The most bloody and cruel wars of all history have been between religious bodies growing out of their control over the affairs of government. The intolerance and fanatical cruelty of religious bodies has been a disgrace to Christianity and to civilization. We want none of it in this country. Any attempt at church or religious influence or control over the political or governmental affairs must be condemned and crushed in the beginning if religious freedom and civic rights are to be protected and preserved. The unwise activities of church and religious influence in politics have aroused serious animosities and antagonism resulting in the organization of a secret society or association, the object of which is to antagonize and defeat any and every candidate for office supported by such influences. It is this political conflict between religious influence and a secret opposing organization that gives cause for great concern. Both religious and such secret organizations, so far as they deal in politics on any such grounds, are seriously in the wrong. It is just as reprehensible for any class of American citizens to combine or conspire together to defeat the political aspirations of a citizen because of his religion as it is for citizens of his religious faith to support him because of his religious beliefs, thus bringing religion into politics. It raises a false issue. It is un-American. It is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. Any religious organization that presents any such issue invites a religious controversy in secular and civic affairs that may result in the most serious consequences. It has been made a direct issue in elections in some of the States already and has defeated some candidates for office. It has entered into this body and may, if the conflict continues, change its complexion. It is an evil that unless speedily exposed and patriotically suppressed will grow and spread. It should be the duty of every American citizen, whatever his religious beliefs, and every religious organization of whatever faith, to set face against every effort or tendency to bring religion into politics or make the religious faith of any citizen a test of his right or fitness for public office.

FAILURE TO PROTECT AMERICAN CITIZENS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

One of the most solemn and imperative duties of any and every government is that of protecting the lives, the liberty, and the rights of property of its citizens abroad as well as at home. A failure to perform this sacred duty is the strongest kind of evidence of weakness. It creates a feeling of distrust and animosity on the part of the citizen whose rights go unprotected and a general want of respect for their country by all people. The duty of loyalty on the part of the citizen and the protection of his rights by the Government are mutual and dependent obligations, neither less strong than the other.

If a government neglects its duty in this respect, it must expect a lesser degree of respect and loyalty on the part of its citizens, and this tends toward the weakness and decay of a government of and by the people. That this Government has failed in its duty to its own people in this respect for the last few years, under very trying circumstances and when many American citizens needed the support and protection of their Government the most, has been painfully evident and has been very generally condemned by our own people. Not only so, but it has put this Government in a most humiliating situation in the eyes of other countries. The neglect of our people in Mexico may be cited as the most striking failure of the Government to guard and protect the rights of its citizens. The treatment of our citizens in that country throughout the revolution, disorder, and anarchy in Mexico is one of the darkest pages of our history as a Nation. Instead of protecting their lives and their property where they were and had every right to be, all protection was withdrawn from them and they were compelled to abandon their all, in many cases the accumulation of years of labor, and flee for their lives or put themselves under the protection of some foreign country. No American citizen who knows what the obligations of his Government are under such circumstances and appreciates it can look back upon this page of the Nation's history without a sense of shame and humiliation. It is one of the convincing evidences of the weakness and decay of a nation.

In commenting on the failure of the Government to protect its citizens, Theodore Roosevelt, a distinguished American citizen and once President of the United States, quotes with approval this passage from John Fiske's Critical Period of American History:

> A government touches the lowest point of ignominy when it confesses its inability to protect the lives and the property of its citizens. A government which has come to this has failed in discharging the primary function of government and forthwith ceases to have any reason for existing.

Nearly 40 years ago Mr. Evarts, then Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Foster, our minister to Mexico:

> The first duty of a government is to protect life and property. This is a paramount obligation. For this governments are instituted, and governments neglecting or failing to perform it become worse than useless. * * * Protection in fact to American lives and property is the sole point upon which the United States are tenacious.

And Senator Root, one of the leading statesmen of the present time, in ringing, patriotic words, thus announces the duty of the Government to protect its citizens everywhere and in solemn words declares the neglect of that duty to be the beginning of the death of the Nation:

> The imminent, deadly peril of the Americans in Mexico was not a mere question of property or of human life. It was a question of national duty and honor and right to existence, for a nation that is indifferent to the oppression and destruction of its citizens anywhere on earth has already begun to die.

CAPITAL AND LABOR—IDLE AND PROFLIGATE RICH.

Mr. President, the problems growing out of the conflicting interests and claims of capital and labor, employer and employee, are amongst the most difficult and, in some respects, the most dangerous that the Government will have to contend with in the years to come. They affect not only the commercial and business affairs of the country, but enter into the social and economic relations of millions of our people. Great wealth in the hands of a few of the capitalistic and employer class has made them proud, arrogant, and oppressive, while as a countercheck the laboring class has organized and often uses its organization with a force and brutality no less reprehensible and dangerous to the public welfare than the oppressive use of the money power. The conflict of these two forces, whose interests in great measure should be identical, has arrayed these two great industrial forces against each other, and both are active and constantly at work using all of the influences of their money and their organizations to secure favorable legislation from legislative bodies, both State and National. It is a melancholy fact that these influences have to a very great degree reached legislative bodies and brought about unfortunate and discriminatory laws that should never have been enacted. As I have already said, class legislation is the most dangerous and inexcusable of all laws. They are un-American and an offense against our free republican institutions. They take into account the interests of a class attempted to be favored and consider the public interests not at all. Some general, definite legislation should be enacted that would secure the settlement of all labor disputes by peaceful means through some disinterested civil tribunal, and any and all forms of force or coercion, direct or indirect, be forbidden under severe penalties. It seems to me that Congress has the undoubted power, in the interest of the public welfare, to compel the settlement of such disputes, so far as they affect Federal interests, by arbitration or resort to the courts, and to prevent the attempt to settle them by arbitrary or forceful action by any of the parties directly concerned, and the law-making power of this great and powerful Nation should have the moral courage to take such action as will bring this about, and that speedily.

But, Mr. President, as I conceive, there is a more serious and dangerous side to this problem than the disturbance of business by whatever means. This division of our people into classes, depending upon the amount of money they possess or the nature of their calling, whereby in the public estimation the man who lives by manual labor is placed in and regarded as belonging to an inferior class for that reason only, and another man less worthy and less respectable is placed in a superior class because he does not labor with his hands and is possessed of greater wealth or because one is the employer of the other, is bound sooner or later to result disastrously to a Government founded on the principle of absolute equality of opportunity and of rights under the law.

To me one of the most pathetic and at the same time the most deplorable features of this situation is that the laboring people willingly accept this classification of them as inferior and appeal for legislation in their behalf on this very ground. The whole thing is obnoxious to every principle of popular government, and this division of men and women into classes can find no reason or justification in principle or in law, human or divine.

Mr. President, there is another serious side to this situation that should not be overlooked in estimating its effects on the public interests and its tendency toward degeneracy and final dissolution of a democratic Government. The accumulation of inordinate wealth has given us another class of people that has no place in a Government like ours, namely, the idle and profligate rich. They are leeches on society, a useless incumbrance, and an evil example that leads to idleness, profligacy, and crime on the part of others as well as themselves. It would be a good thing and wholesome in its effects if every man living on his income and following no useful employment should be compelled by law to work at some useful occupation, if not for himself then for the State. To live in idleness is not only degenerating in its effects upon the man who does not work but it leads others to the same useless way of living that permeates and lowers the standard of the community as a whole.

While I am about it let me mention one other phase of this question. There is great discontent on the part of the laboring class growing out of the high living and show of wealth and display by their more fortunate countrymen in a worldly way. The thoughtless rich, whether idle or not, are constantly flaunting the evidences of their wealth in the faces of their less fortunate fellow citizens. I never see an American citizen in his automobile or carriage driven by another American citizen dressed in livery, a badge of servitude and inferiority, that I do not feel a sense of resentment at this aping of royalty and the degenerating flunkyism that it engenders. It is an inexcusable departure from the simplicity that should characterize the conduct of the people of a free Republic founded on the great preserving principle of equality. Men and women of great wealth are setting an example that if followed will inevitably lead to disaster. They are leading the way to the degeneracy of their own class and the degradation of what they are pleased to regard as their servants, if not their slaves, and as belonging to an inferior class only fit to serve them, that is growing worse and more threatening as time goes on. The rich are growing richer and the poor poorer as the country grows more rich and more powerful, and division of the people into classes becomes more marked and more hurtful to the public interests and the rich become more arrogant and offensive to those who are foolish enough to look up to them as superior beings only because of their offensive display of wealth.

SUPERTAX ON WEALTH.

Mr. President, it is a very nice thing for the man of moderate means to contemplate the spectacle of forcing the man of large means to pay most of the taxes by levying heavily on his income if it exceeds a certain sum, but it may not be out of place to call attention to the probable effect of this means of raising public revenue. I have already commented upon the fact that more and more big business, wealth, and the power of the great corporations are influencing and controlling legislation and the affairs of government in all its branches. I am very much afraid that this innovation of exacting heavy tribute from such interests will contribute to an increase of this baleful influence over politics and government. The men of large incomes, that are increasing in number, and the amounts of their annual incomes, if they are called upon to pay the larger share of the expenses of operating the Government, will have great reason to say, "If we support the Government we should be allowed to control its management and say how our Government shall be run and our money expended." How far this kind of legislation is going to affect this result no one can tell, but I do not hesitate to say that in principle it is wrong and will tend to evil consequences. I look with disfavor and apprehension upon the accumulation of immense fortunes in the hands of a comparatively few, or, for that matter, any number of individual men or combinations of men in any form. I think it should be prevented in the public interest. I believe the fortune that any man may acquire in this country should be limited by law to a reasonable sum and in the forfeiting to the Government or the State of all he may accumulate over the limited amount in that way, to be used for charitable or other beneficent purposes, or, if in business, to be divided with his employees; but I do not like the idea of giving a man of large income a greater interest in the Government than have a hundred or more men having collectively an income equal to his. Besides, this means of raising revenue renders the contribution of the several States unequal. The States having a few citizens of large income may be compelled to contribute more to maintain the Government than another State having a greater population and property of greater value. I submit, sir, that any system of taxation that discriminates between the taxpayers of the country as to the proportion of taxes they shall pay is vicious and calculated to bring us serious trouble.

CENTRALIZATION OF GOVERNMENT—ABANDONMENT OF STATE RIGHTS.

Mr. President, I have given attention to some of the processes of government and habits of the people that, if persisted in, as I look upon them, lead to weakness, degeneracy, and final dissolution of our form of government. In the estimation of others some of them may seem trivial and unworthy of serious consideration. As to some of them, taken singly, this is undoubtedly so, but taking them together, as showing the tendencies of the times in which we live, they call for the thoughtful and candid attention and treatment of all lovers of liberty and free popular government.

I come now, sir, to the contemplation of another question which is of itself and standing alone of transcendent importance. I have more than once since I have been a Member of this body referred to the tendency of legislation toward the centralization of government to the exclusion of the States and local civil and municipal organizations. To me the more singular and at the same time the most hopeless phase of it is that it does not come so much from an attempt or desire on the part of the Federal Government to usurp the powers of the States, as a willingness, desire, and persistent attempt by their Representatives in Congress to surrender and abandon the rights and evade the duties and obligations of the States for mercenary reasons and a money consideration. This I have said here in general terms more than once. I desire now to amplify what I have already said, to go more specifically into the extent to which Congress has entered upon this process of centralization and to point out the dangers to a free Republic and the Federation of States that lurk behind this endeavor to get money out of the National Treasury by the surrender to the Government of the sovereign rights of the States. I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate in any extended discussion of the constitutional rights of the Federal Government and the several States, respectively. Every Senator, every intelligent and well-informed American citizen knows that the Government has only such powers as are expressly granted to it by the Constitution and such incidental powers as are necessary to carry out and make effective the powers thus delegated, and that all other powers are reserved to and remain in the States.

In the great debate in this body, early in the history of the country, between Senators Webster and Hayne, Mr. Webster put it this way:

> The people, then, sir, erected this Government. They gave it a Constitution, and in that Constitution they have enumerated the powers which they bestow on it. They have made it a limited government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of such powers as are granted; and all others, they declare, are reserved to the States or the people.

And again:

> The General Government and the State governments derive their authority from the same source. Neither can, in relation to the other, be called primary, though one is definite and restricted and the other general and residuary. The National Government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people have conferred on it, and no more. All the rest belongs to the State governments, or to the people themselves.

Mr. Hayne, then the avowed champion of State rights in the broadest sense and going far beyond Mr. Webster, had this to say on the subject:

> Who, then, Mr. President, are the true friends of the Union? Those who would confine the Federal Government strictly within the limits prescribed by the Constitution, who would preserve to the States and the people all powers not expressly delegated, who would make this a Federal and not a National Union, and who, administering the Government in a spirit of equal justice, would make it a blessing and not a curse. And who are its enemies? Those who are in favor of consolidation, who are constantly stealing power from the States and adding strength to the Federal Government; who, assuming an unwarrantable jurisdiction over the States and the people, undertake to regulate the whole industry and capital of the country.

In support of his position, Mr. Hayne thus quoted Mr. Jefferson in a letter to Mr. Giles, written about the same time. He says:

> I see as you do, and with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the Federal branch of our Government is advancing toward the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic, and that, too, by constructions which leave no limits to their powers, etc. Under the power to regulate commerce they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, etc. Under the authority to establish post roads they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads and digging canals, etc.

Mr. Hayne went so far as to maintain that each State had the right to determine for itself what its sovereign rights were and to nullify and refuse to be bound by any law of Congress that it held to be in violation of its rights as a State. But this claim was forever put at rest by the Civil War as well as by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which, it is now settled, is the one and only tribunal having power and jurisdiction to settle finally controversies of this kind arising between a State and the National Government. There can be no doubt of the wisdom of vesting this jurisdiction in the Federal courts. But it is morally certain that this has tended to magnify and increase, by construction, the powers of the Government as against the States. It is a well-understood fact that, as a rule, all Federal officers magnify their own power and the power of the Government. Perhaps the courts are freer from this weakness than are the officers of other departments.

Thomas Jefferson, in his inaugural address of March 4, 1801, in stating "the essential principles of our Government," thus tersely and concisely stated what appeals to me as the correct rule on the subject:

> The support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies, and the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad.

My own position is that in order to preserve the equilibrium of the Union of States it is necessary that the powers of both the National Government and the States should be accurately ascertained and preserved, one as much as the other. There has been but little difficulty in arriving at the powers of the National Government as expressly granted to it by the Constitution. The trouble has been to determine with anything like accuracy the extent to which it may go to enforce and make effective the powers thus granted, or, in other words, what incidental powers not expressly granted it may exercise as a means of enforcing and making effective its unquestioned delegated powers. And, sir, this is the rock upon which this ship of state, composed of individual States, is most likely to founder. Again I refrain from going into any extensive discussion of this subject, upon which so much learning has been expended by statesmen, jurists, and historians. I am dealing with general principles of government and endeavoring to demonstrate to the Senate and the country that we are treading on dangerous ground and pursuing a course that may, and almost certainly will, eventually lead to disaster unless, as some think, a centralized government will best serve the interests of the people. I do not think so.

Mr. President, it is my purpose to call attention with some particularity to the course of legislation enacted and threatened that, in my judgment, leads directly and inevitably to the establishment of a centralized government here in the Capital of the Nation and the ultimate destruction of all sovereign power in the States, and that without the amendment of the Constitution in the manner provided for in its provisions. This of itself, of course, would be a usurpation of power and a denial to the people of the rights guaranteed to them by the fundamental law under which their Government was formed and now exists, with some of their constitutional rights already taken away from them or abandoned to the Federal Government by the acts of their own Representatives in Congress.

Let me refer to a few of the acts and proposed acts of legislation that are driving us headlong toward a centralized and highly paternal Government:

The so-called good-roads law, lately enacted; provisions for Federal vocational schools in the States; the extension of the Public Health Service in the States; the proposed water-power legislation; the establishment of nitrate plants to supply fertilizers for the farmers; the child-labor law; the charitable appropriations to meet losses of citizens within the States by storms and other disasters; the extension of the powers and activities of the Agricultural Department to matters of State and local concern; rural-credit legislation; the hundreds of appropriations that are being made year after year in aid of the States and individuals within the States; the raising of numerous special commissions that are being added to every year; and the proposed railroad legislation leading to the fixing of rates and hours of labor for working people. These are only a few of the legislative acts that might be mentioned, but they will serve to direct the attention of the Senate to the dangerous tendencies of legislation of this character to which I am now addressing myself.

I want to call the attention of the Senate a little more particularly to my reasons for thinking that the kind of legislation illustrated by the few cases referred to are unconstitutional, objectionable, and dangerous.

The good-roads law is clearly objectionable on constitutional grounds. The Government is not authorized by the Constitution to build or improve the public highways within the States, particularly where they are wholly within a State. Nobody pretends to say it has. Expenditure of money for such a purpose could only be justified, or even excused, by showing that the highway to be constructed was necessary to be used to carry out some other delegated power and as incidental to it. This obvious limitation of power on the part of the Government was recognized in the bill by the pretense that the roads to be constructed and improved were post roads and were to be improved to facilitate the carrying of the United States mails. But everybody here knew that was not the purpose. This claim was a cheat which only made the offense of invading the rights of the States and misappropriating the people's money that much worse. The law was not only unconstitutional, it was fraudulent. Every argument made in support of it was founded upon the benefit improved highways would be to the people of the States, especially to the farmers. If the building or improvements by the National Government for such a purpose can be justified, then Congress may lawfully appropriate Government funds to make any public improvement within a State if it will benefit the people or any class of people. The validity of this law will probably never be tested. The people of the States are altogether too willing to accept gratuities of this kind from the Government. But if it ever is contested it can be sustained only for the reason that the courts will not inquire into the motives of Congress in enacting it, as the law on its face shows that the money is to be expended for the improvement of roads over which the mails are carried, and therefore incidental to the power and duty of the Federal Government to transport the mails. It would make no difference in that case that this was a false pretense and everybody but the court knows it to be so.

But, Mr. President, the fact that such a law is unconstitutional is not by any means the only just objection to it. It is an unwarranted encroachment upon the rights of the States. The States alone have jurisdiction over the highways within their borders. It is their right, uninfluenced by any other power or jurisdiction, to say when and where and how their roads shall be built or improved. To allow the Federal Government any control of these highways is an unlawful extension of the powers of the General Government, and to that extent a usurpation of power and an encroachment upon the sovereign rights of the States, besides being a very objectionable kind of paternalism that is against public policy. It is cultivating in the minds of the people of the States the false theory that the Government should supply their needs and relieve them of all responsibility and expense. It tends to the dependency of the people and consequent weakness of the States. To me such legislation has no redeeming quality but is fundamentally wrong in principle, vicious in character, and degenerating and dangerous in its effects.

The law for the establishment and maintenance of vocational schools within the States at Government expense is of the same character, and equally if not more objectionable than the good-roads law. It gives the Federal Government a control and influence over the education of the children of a State that it does not rightly possess, and is to be condemned as an unlawful and illegitimate exercise of authority and an infringement upon the rights and powers of the States.

The steady and persistent encroachments of the Public Health Service in its growing activities in the States is one of the worst phases of this tendency and disposition to concentrate all power in the National Government. To say nothing of the baleful effects of the horrifying health-destroying literature sent out into the States by the Health Service it is more and more taking over the duties that belong to and should be exercised by the State authorities alone. All of the States are well supplied, most of them oversupplied, with health organizations, many of them doing more harm than good. But Congress, influenced by the Federal health authorities, has not been content to leave these matters to the States, where they belong under the Constitution. State, county, and city boards of health exist, I believe, in every State in the Union. They are, as a rule, just as able and competent to deal with health problems as are the officers of the National Health Service. And yet the Government is spending millions of dollars every year in duplicating or performing the work that should be done wholly by the States and at their expense.

The only plausible excuse for this palpable misappropriation and waste of public funds is that the Government has more money and greater power than a State, and for that reason can perform the service better and more effectively. The evil effects of this position must be evident. It serves to take away all incentive and initiative on the part of the States and leads the people of the States to depend upon the National Government to do for them what they should do for themselves, and extends the Federal power into every State entirely beyond its legitimate scope. Let me instance a few of the latest advances of the Public Health Service into the domain of the States. The last thing asked for at the last session of Congress was an additional division in the service to be known as the division of rural sanitation. Of course, there can be no rural territory over which the National Government has jurisdiction except in the District of Columbia and the Territories. But the activities of the Health Service has been systematically and without authority extended to the sanitary work in several of the States, and the service is now asking for an additional division, which it is claimed will enable it to carry on the work already under way more efficiently. Evidence taken before the Senate Committee on Public Health disclosed the fact that this rural-sanitation work consisted in great part, at least, in the survey, so called, of counties in the States at an expense of $6,000 a county in different localities in a number of the States. The plan was to inspect the farms, the springs, wells, dwelling houses, and barns, and advise the farmers of the best way of conducting and carrying on their farms for the preservation of the health of themselves and their families. When asked why this, if necessary, should not be left to the State authorities, the only answer was that the States had not money enough to do the work, and as an excuse for Government interference it was claimed by the Health Service that bad sanitary conditions on the farms and in the rural districts might cause malaria, typhoid fever, and other similar diseases which, it was claimed, are transmissible diseases and might be carried from one State to another, thus making it an interstate affair and within the jurisdiction of the Federal authorities.

The whole thing is so absurd and untenable that it could hardly be supposed that it would find any supporters in Congress, but, strange as it may seem, it has found earnest supporters in this body. Such a broad construction of the powers of the National Government to deal with matters within the States would remove all barriers and destroy all limitations of the Federal authorities and make it unnecessary to maintain State or other boards of health by the States. This instance of Federal usurpation of State sovereignty through the Health Service is only one of many. The present tendency, as well as the endeavors of the health authorities, is to assume and exercise full and unlimited power over the health of the people of the States. And the States and their health authorities seem perfectly willing to have it so, for the reason already suggested, that it saves them money and responsibility and imposes the burden on the Federal Government.

But, Mr. President, the extreme limit of Federal usurpation, so far, was reached in the child-labor law forced through Congress at the last session largely, if not entirely, for political purposes. In substance the law makes it unlawful to ship any goods in interstate commerce that have been manufactured in an establishment in which a child or children under a certain age were employed whether they were engaged in the manufacture of the goods shipped or not. This law has been attempted to be justified by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upholding what has come to be known as the white-slave act. But, sir, I maintain that there is no analogy between the two acts, and that there is nothing in the white-slave decision to support the constitutionality of the child-labor law. The child-labor law attempts to make unlawful an act committed wholly within a State and entirely and exclusively under the jurisdiction of a State, and to prevent its commission by excluding from transportation into another State manufactured articles perfectly harmless to commerce and to the State into which they are carried. The claim that such transportation is harmful or injurious is sheer pretense. The law is directed wholly against the employment of child labor within a State and nothing else, and as, admittedly, the Government can not define or punish such a crime within a State, it is attempted to punish it indirectly by making unlawful a perfectly lawful and inoffensive act, namely, the shipment of entirely innocent and harmless manufactured goods. There can be no possible analogy of such a law to the white-slave act. That act provides:

That any person who shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for, or in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or in the District of Columbia, any woman or girl for the purposes of prostitution.

This is to prohibit, in terms, transportation in foreign or interstate commerce for an unlawful purpose. That is to say, the act of interstate transportation over which Congress has undoubted jurisdiction is itself for an unlawful purpose. This is not so of the child-labor law, nor is it claimed to be so. As I have said the act sought to be prevented has no connection with or effect upon the thing over which alone Congress has jurisdiction, namely, interstate commerce. The difference between the white-slave act and the child-labor law and the principle upon which the former was upheld will be made perfectly obvious by a few brief extracts from the opinion in Hoke v. United States (227 U. S., 308) involving the constitutionality of the white-slave law.

In defining the meaning and object of the law the court said:

What the act condemns is transportation obtained or aided or transportation induced in interstate commerce for the immoral purposes mentioned.

And again in commenting on the act to prevent the transportation of impure food and adulterated drugs in interstate commerce, the court said:

It may be that Congress could not prohibit the manufacture of the article in a State. It may be that Congress could not prohibit in all of its conditions its sale within a State. But Congress may prohibit its transportation between the States and by that means defeat the motive and evils of its manufacture.

The pure-food act is clearly distinguishable from the child-labor law. There the thing to be transported was injurious to health and therefore its transportation, which aided in its additional sale and wider distribution, was itself an offense within Federal jurisdiction.

Further, in defining the power of Congress the court had this to say:

The principle established by the cases is the simple one, when rid of confusing and distracting considerations, that Congress has power over transportation "among the several States"; that the power is complete in itself and that Congress, as an incident to it, may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulations.

It must be evident that the power of Congress is confined to the protection of the people of the States from the use of interstate transportation for evil or injurious purposes affecting the States. There is no such element in the child-labor law and no such principle to uphold it.

I voted for the child-labor law principally because I believed it would afford an opportunity for the Supreme Court to define the respective powers of the Federal and State authorities and to check the prevailing tendency to unduly enlarge and extend Federal authority over State affairs and the consequent breaking down of the constitutional barriers between Federal and State sovereignty.

The various laws to which I have adverted are founded on, or attempted to be justified under, the public welfare and commerce clauses of the Constitution and the incidental one of police regulation. In my opinion these provisions of the Constitution have already, in some instances, been too liberally construed in favor of Federal jurisdiction as against the States. But it is too obvious that Congress is ready and willing to go further in this direction than the courts have gone, and it is this principally that I am complaining of as unwarranted and dangerous.

If we can go as far as is proposed in the laws that I have already mentioned, then there is practically no limit to the right or the power of the Government to legislate for the benefit of the people of the States in cooperation with or to the exclusion of State authority. If the Government can go into a State to aid in educating its children or in protecting those who labor from too long hours of service, on the ground that to improve the condition of one child in a State is within the welfare clause of the Constitution, or that it may forbid the use of interstate-commerce facilities under the commerce clause to a manufacturer because of the means by which his goods are manufactured in a State, then there is no limit to the powers of the National Government, for under that construction the making of any public improvement anywhere in the country or the betterment of the condition of a single child in any State in the Union is in a sense a public benefit and for the welfare of the whole Nation, as an elevation of its citizenship and the enlightenment and advantage of some one citizen that helps to make up the masses in all the States that constitute also the citizenship of the Nation, as well as of the individual States, and would bring it within the welfare clause. That must be the final outcome, the logical result of such legislation as I have been considering, if upheld by the courts. That Congress has gone that far in enacting the child-labor law there is no denying. The Supreme Court of the United States may follow that far, but I trust not.

Mr. President, more and more we are concentrating the regulation of railroads and other corporations here in Washington. We are about entering upon the hazardous undertaking of fixing and regulating wages for employees of corporations doing an interstate business, as well as their hours of labor. This of necessity involves the changes of rates and charges to be made by such corporations to meet changes that may be made from time to time of hours of labor and the wages to be paid. Thus practically we centralize in the National Government the power not only to regulate rates and charges, but to say how many hours hundreds of thousands of laboring men and women all over the country shall work and the wages they shall receive. It will be an unhappy day for the laboring people when this condition is brought about. It will take from them the power to contract for their wages, as well as for the hours they may work, and subject them to the powerful, almost irresistible, power of the great corporations to control legislation. They will no longer be free and independent agents, with the right to deal, by contract or in any other independent way, with the vital things that affect the lives and fortunes of themselves and their families. In effect, they will be placed under the guardianship of the Government and made dependent on Congress for their daily bread. Such legislation will destroy the independence of the laboring class of American citizens and make them little better than slaves. Every laboring man and woman in the country should rise in revolt against this movement to humiliate and degrade them and their calling.

Mr. President, if we have reached a condition in this country where it has become necessary to thus reduce the laboring people to this helpless condition of dependence on the will of Congress and place them under the guardianship of the Government, we had better accept the inevitable and take over the ownership of all corporations doing an interstate business and have done with it at once. If we do, this will be followed by corporations doing intrastate business being taken over by the States as a necessary and inevitable consequence, and we will then have paternalized National and State Governments with all their devastating and demoralizing influences. That will sooner or later result in the swallowing up of the States by the Federal Government and the taking over of all this vast power by the centralized forces in the National Capital. I know Senators may say all this is mere speculation, and that the things I have mentioned may never happen. But, sir, I am talking now about tendencies of Government, and no candid man can look present conditions in the face and contemplate the legislation that is now proposed and say that we are not driving on to just such conditions in the future as I have suggested. Do we want even to start along the road that will, if pursued, inevitably lead to such results? I shall not be here to help to deal with this momentous question growing out of the unfortunate conflict between capital and labor, but there are Senators about me who will have to meet just this situation I am now laying before you. I pray God they may solve the problem in a way that will preserve the independence of the American people of all classes and redound to the future glory of this great Nation, the institutions of which are now on trial and being put to the test as they never were before.

Mr. President, I am not going to spend time in analyzing the other cases of legislation that I have mentioned above as leading inevitably to this result. I have said enough to inform the Senate what my views on the subject are, which must suffice for the present. I pass now to the consideration of the effects of such a course, and what I am greatly afraid will be the ultimate outcome of it all, and in doing so I shall take the liberty of quoting from others who have stated their views and expressed their fears and apprehensions growing out of the consummated and threatened usurpation of power by the Federal Government.

The protests I am now making against Executive usurpation and centralized government are not new. They have been discussed and their dangers pointed out by distinguished statesmen and jurists almost from the beginning of this Republic down to the present time, but neither Congress nor the Presidents of later times have given heed to the oft-repeated warnings of men like these, many of them profound students of the history of nations and the science of government, and in spite of them conditions have grown worse in the last few years until to-day they are looked upon by many thinking people as alarming. I feel it a solemn duty at the close of my service here to call the attention of the Senate and the country to some of the sentiments expressed by men whose views should command universal attention, and to emphasize what they have so well said. I have referred to some of the sayings of Mr. Jefferson on the subject, but I desire to quote from him a little further. In a letter to C. Hammond he states with clearness and precision what he regards as the results of centralizing all power in Washington, as we are now so rapidly doing. He says, amongst other things:

When all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another, and will become as venal and oppressive as the Government from which we separated. It will be, as in Europe, where every man must be either pike or gudgeon, hammer or anvil. Our functionaries and theirs are wares from the same workshop, made of the same materials and by the same hand. If the States look with apathy on this silent descent of their government into the gulf which is to swallow all, we have only to weep over the human character formed uncontrollable, but by a rod of iron, and the blasphemers of man, as incapable of self-government, become his true historians.

And in his autobiography (Ford, ed.) we find this:

It is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution, that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made, that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly and what it can so much better do than a distant authority.

So again his fears and apprehension are stated more fully in a letter to William B. Giles, in which he says:

I see with the deepest affliction the rapid strides with which the Federal branch of our Government is advancing toward the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic; and that, too, by constructions which, if legitimate, leave no limits to their power. Take together the decisions of the Federal court, the doctrines of the President (John Quincy Adams), and the misconstructions of the constitutional compact acted on by the legislature of the Federal branch, and it is but too evident that the three ruling branches of that department are in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authorities, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all functions foreign and domestic. Under the power to regulate commerce they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry, and that, too, the most depressed, and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all. Under the authority to establish post roads they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads, of digging canals, and aided by a little sophistry on the words "general welfare," a right to do, not only the acts to effect that, which are specifically enumerated and permitted, but whatsoever they shall think or pretend will be for the general welfare.

No one at this day will question the patriotism of Thomas Jefferson or his fidelity to the fundamental principles of the Government. And we are to-day to an alarming degree verifying the fears and apprehensions of this great patriot and statesman. He saw with his farseeing vision the dangers that were even then confronting the country in a very moderate degree as compared with the present time. Fortunately, he did not live to see his fears verified. Probably none of us will live to see the complete centralization of power in the National Government, ruled by a dictator, but that we are tending rapidly in that direction, that the dangers to the liberties of the people and their control over their Government are threatening and much more imminent than in the time of Thomas Jefferson, must be obvious to every thinking and observant American citizen.

Mr. President, what are the forces that are driving us toward this outcome? Mainly ambition and lust of power on the part of men elevated to the head of the executive department of the Government, the greed and cupidity of the people of the States who are willing to barter their sovereignty for money out of the National Treasury, and the lust for office and patronage through which the President wields such enormous power in controlling Members of Congress and others. These are the most powerful enemies of a government of the people.

Coming down to a later time, we have the solemn warning of William Henry Harrison, then President of the United States. His denunciation of these influences I have already quoted in discussing the usurpation of the Executive. His comment on the then powerful influence of patronage in the hands of the Chief Magistrate impels consideration of present conditions. The large additional number of Federal officers to be appointed by the President and the consequent increase of power in the hands of the Executive has been enormous, and that power is now being used to a degree never before known to bend public officials to the will of the President.

In view of the present state of politics, the claim of the President to be the head of his party, and the extent to which legislation is swayed by political and party considerations, I feel a desire to quote again the patriotic utterance of President Harrison on the subject, but shall desist.

Having quoted somewhat extensively from statesmen of earlier times, I now attract the attention of the Senate to some of the views of men of modern times, whose sentiments are worthy of the most careful consideration.

David J. Brewer, one of the greatest jurists of his time, in an address delivered by him before the Arkansas and Texas Bar Associations in 1906, discussed this question with great freedom and frankness, particularly as it related to the Supreme Court of the United States, of which he was then a distinguished and trusted member. He gave particular attention to the false sentiment we hear expressed so often at this time that the courts should so construe the Constitution as to meet altered conditions and changing public sentiment, enlarging and modifying its provisions as appeared to be necessary for this purpose. I quote in part what he said on that subject:

This enlargement of the powers of the National Government is not to be regarded as the mere result of judicial action. It is an expression of the thought and desire of many, a thought and desire which took partial shape in the three post bellum amendments, and which is very clearly shown, both in the newspaper press and in the character of legislation which is constantly pressed upon the attention of Congress. There is also an evident attempt through public opinion thus formed to induce the Supreme Court to further this national enlargement.

It is urged that this is one Nation that in order that it fulfill its functions as a world power it must have all the powers which other nations possess; that law is but the reflex of public opinion, and if public opinion requires an enlargement of or an addition to the powers of Congress above and beyond those named in the Constitution the court must sanction the legislation to accomplish that end. If this tendency increases and the court responds to that kind of suggestion, it will not be long before it will become impossible to say that this is a government of enumerated powers, but, on the other hand, it will be a government with all the powers vested in the legislative and executive authorities of any nation; and the tenth amendment, which reserves to the people what they have not in terms granted, will become a voiceless and unmeaning part of the Constitution.

He then proceeds to emphasize the fact that this is a Government of the people and that the people alone have power to amend, enlarge, or modify the Constitution, and deprecates the idea that the Supreme Court may exercise any such power. On that branch of the subject he said, in part:

I know that there are changed conditions and a different social and business life from that which obtained when the Constitution was framed. It may be that new laws are necessary, possibly amendments to the Constitution, but it must always be remembered that this is a government of and by the people; and if additions and changes are necessary, let them be made in the appointed way. Never let the courts attempt to change laws or Constitution to meet what they think present conditions require. When they do this they clearly usurp powers belonging to the legislature and the people.

I fully believe that this Nation, as a nation, has all the powers which any nation possesses, but I as fully believe that those powers are vested in the people and that only such as they have enumerated in the Constitution have they granted to the Government. If they deem that further powers should be vested in that Government, the Constitution provides its own way of amendment, and it will be a sad day when the court is found assenting to the proposition that it has the right to enlarge the terms of that instrument.

And in considering the tendency toward the enlargement of the powers of the National Government at the expense of the States, and the consequent centralization of government, he attracted attention to the dangers of such a course in these words:

Is there not danger in this tendency, and may we not wisely consider whether it ought not to be stayed? I know it is said that the National Government is more efficient than the States, can reach supposed ills in their entirety when the States can only reach them partially. But is efficiency the only test? If it is, then a centralized government with a dictator is the ideal government, for none has such efficiency and thoroughness as a government under the absolute control of a single individual. Is there not danger in this centralization of building up the party machine and the party boss and giving them a power such as has never been dreamed of in this country? How strenuously even now the party whip is swung over the heads of Congressmen and Senators.

Judge Brewer did not live to see party influence and political bossism exerted in the Congress of the United States for purely selfish and political purposes as it has been in the last few years. He saw its dangers and pointed them out with great clearness. But things have grown rapidly worse, even in the short time since his death, and the influence of politics in legislation combined with the power of the Executive who, at the same time, stands as the leader of his party, has become a real and imminent menace to good government and peril to individual liberty. He goes further, and points out the dangers of magnifying and glorifying the greatness and power of the National Government, which leads inevitably to the enlargement of that power by taking their sovereign powers from the States and adding them to those of the National Government, thus making it still greater and more powerful. And, in this connection, he presses upon his hearers the greater necessity of educating the individual citizen to know and feel that this is his Government, for which he is in part personally responsible, thus building up an independent and responsible citizenship that can alone maintain a government of the people. I commend his words on this subject to every patriotic American citizen and particularly to their chosen representatives in this body. Of this he says:

The truth is we are charmed and entranced by the thought of the power of the Nation. We glory in all that it has accomplished and the position that it is occupying among the nations of the earth, and we think of it as the supreme object of care. To my mind far more important is the protection of the individual, the building up within him of a sense of his personal responsibility. Naturally he will become inattentive and careless when he feels that the responsibility for the affairs of his community is not vested in the inhabitants of that community, but is located in Washington. While I rejoice with all others in the magnificent position of this Nation in the sight of the world, I rejoice far more in seeing the individual citizens of the separate communities so interested in the public welfare that for their communities they are striving to maintain justice and righteousness. For the most glorious product of our civilization is not the entrancing beauty of the Capital, the magnificence, wealth, or extravagance of the Government, its ironclads, or its Navy, its wonderful system of railroads, its marvelous manufacturing, mining, and other industries, but rather the individual's possession of an independent, conscientious, public-spirited citizenship.

Never will we pass the danger line until those who dwell in all our communities realize that upon themselves rests the burden of our civilization. It is human nature to turn responsibilities off, if possible, and if you develop in the locality a general feeling that in a Government at Washington rests full responsibility, the individual will steadily lose the spirit of independent public-spirited citizenship. I am not pessimistic. I believe in the glorious future of this Republic, for though I clearly see the tendency to-day, I as firmly believe that there will yet be a glorious resurrection of that spirit of individuality, that sense of personal responsibility which can alone give to this Nation an enduring and brilliant future.

* * * * * * *

That which I wish to call attention to is that too much and too frequent interference by Government blunts the sense of individual responsibility, and the danger is that we drift to a condition where the individual abandons his own duty and simply appeals to Government. So that if a man buys a pair of shoes which pinch his feet he will rush to the legislature for some statute regulating shoemaking, and for fear the State legislature can not reach every shoemaker in the land, hasten to Washington to have Congress undertake the work of regulation under its power over interstate commerce. The police power, never yet defined, is constantly broadening in its exercise, until it threatens to become an omnivorous governmental mouth, swallowing individual rights and immunities. Those guarantees of personal rights, which to my mind are the most valuable portions of the Constitution, are, if not openly disregarded, at least slurred over.

The closing words of this admirable and patriotic address may well be kept in memory. As he well says, "The protection of the liberty of the individual is the great duty of the Republic." Never in all the history of the country has it been so important that this sentiment should be borne in upon the minds of the people than at the present moment. Let me quote his words:

Let it never be forgotten that the protection of the liberty of the individual is the great duty of the Republic. Liberty; it is one of the grandest words in the English tongue.

I believe in the liberty of the soul, subject to no restraint but the law of love, and in the liberty of the individual, limited only by the equal rights of his neighbor. Whatever may be the changes of the future, whatever the new conditions of social, business, or political life, the time will never come when anything will justify shackling the golden rule or striking down the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. President, the patriotic sentiment so eloquently expressed by this distinguished jurist should be made the watchword of liberty and free government in every household, at every fireside throughout this broad land. It should be a part of the education imparted to the youth of the Republic in our schools, public and private. It needs now, more than ever before, to be repeated and emphasized as one powerful means of checking the unpatriotic and dangerous tendencies that I have been discussing.

In an address before the New York Bar Association, Charles Evans Hughes, another distinguished jurist and statesman, expressed similar views. He emphasized, very properly, the necessity of preserving the powers and functions of both the Federal and State Governments. This I look upon as of supreme importance, as I have already indicated. It is just as important that the National Government should be protected in the powers delegated to it by the Constitution as that it should not be allowed to usurp or destroy the sovereign powers of the States. Both are essential to the preservation of such a dual government as ours.

I shall trespass further upon the time and patience of the Senate to quote from the pen of Elihu Root, lately an able and highly distinguished Member of this body and recognized as one of the greatest statesmen of this time. In an able and thoughtful article published in the North American Review of July and August, 1913, and during his service here, he had this to say on this important subject:

We should observe that the Civil War arose because the Constitution did not draw a clear line between the National and State powers regarding slavery. It is of very great importance that both of these authorities, State and National, shall be preserved together and that the limitations which keep each within its proper province shall be maintained. If the power of the States were to override the power of the Nation, we should ultimately cease to have a nation and become only a body of really separate, although confederated, State sovereignties continually forced apart by diverse interests and ultimately quarreling with one another and separating altogether. On the other hand, if the power of the Nation were to override that of the States and usurp their functions, we should have this vast country, with its great population, inhabiting widely separated regions, differing in climate, in production, in industrial and social interests and ideas, governed in all its local affairs by one all-powerful, central government at Washington, imposing upon the home life and behavior of each community the opinions and ideas of propriety of distant majorities. Not only would this be intolerable and alien to the idea of free self-government, but it would be beyond the power of a central government to do directly. Decentralization would be made necessary by the mass of Government business to be transacted, and so our separate localities would come to be governed by delegated authority—by proconsuls authorized from Washington to execute the will of the great majority of the whole people. No one can doubt that this also would lead by its different route to the separation of our Union. Preservation of our dual system of government, carefully restrained in each of its parts by the limitations of the Constitution, has made possible our growth in local self-government and national power in the past, and, so far as we can see, it is essential to the continuance of that government in the future.

All of these three classes of constitutional limitations are therefore necessary to the perpetuity of our Government. I do not wish to be understood as saying that every single limitation is essential. There are some limitations that might be changed and something different substituted; but the system of limitation must be continued if our governmental system is to continue—if we are not to lose the fundamental principles of government upon which our Union is maintained and upon which our race has won the liberty secured by law, for which it has stood foremost in the world.

It will be seen that Senator Root, like Mr. Justice Hughes, seeks to impress upon the public mind the necessity of preserving intact the powers of both the National and State Governments, a necessity that must be obvious to all thinking people, but one that in these times needs to be brought to public notice and strongly emphasized. He is equally emphatic in his contention that the limitations of the Constitution upon the powers of both governments must be maintained if the institutions of the Government are to be preserved.

Now, Mr. President, having called attention to the sentiments of some of our own countrymen as to our form of government and the means and necessity of preserving it, let me refer briefly to the opinion of a student of nations and himself a historian of distinction as well as a fair and dispassionate observer of our own country.

De Tocqueville, in his Democracy in America, thus comments on centralized as compared with local self-government:

But whenever a central administration affects to supersede the persons most interested I am inclined to suppose that it is either misled or desirous to mislead. However enlightened and however skillful a central power may be, it can not of itself embrace all the details of the existence of a great nation. Such vigilance exceeds the powers of man.

* * * * * * *

It profits me but little, after all, that a vigilant authority should protect the tranquillity of my pleasures and constantly avert all dangers from my path, without my care or my concern, if this same authority is the absolute mistress of my liberty and of my life, and if it so monopolizes all the energy of existence, that when it languishes everything languishes around it, that when it sleeps everything must sleep, that when it dies the State itself must perish.

NEW ALIGNMENT OF POLITICAL PARTIES NECESSARY.

Mr. President, if this Government is to survive and perform its great mission on earth as a free Republic—a Government of the people—the dangerous and degenerating tendencies I have in part recounted must be checked and public sentiment and governmental activities turned in the opposite direction. Personal liberty, the sovereignty of the States and of the Nation in their respective spheres, the independence of the several departments of the Government must be preserved, we must return to that simplicity and economy that characterized the early days of the Republic, and every American citizen, man or woman, rich or poor, black or white, employer or employee, must be protected in his or her life and property and his or her political, industrial, and social rights.

But, sir, it may well be asked how is this to be done? Who is to lead the people out of the unfortunate condition into which they have fallen? Are there enough unselfish and patriotic citizens, men and women, to inaugurate and follow up a movement that will redeem this country from the bondage of commercialism, money seeking, political and official corruption, greed, and vice that now threaten the integrity, the very existence of the Government? I believe there are if only they were once brought together in organized form either within one of the old parties or in a new one. This can not be done under either of the old parties as now constituted and controlled. They have been the instruments through which our worst misfortunes have come upon us. The evil tendencies I have been enumerating have grown up under their administration of the Government. There is practically no fundamental issue between them to-day. It has become, so far as they are concerned, mostly a question of spoils. The encroachments upon the liberties of the people commenced under Republican rule. They have grown infinitely worse and more offensive under Democratic domination. The Progressive Party has proved a failure because it was founded on malice, hatred, and a spirit of revenge and the personality of one man. No such party could hope to survive. When adversity came, and in its hour of need, its leaders, including its candidates for President and Vice President, consulting their own personal ambitions, deserted the party they had helped to found, as might have been expected. Only a few of the members of the party had any fixed principles of reform. The great majority of them were not the supporters of principles, but of men, or one man. Those who are Progressives from conviction stood by their principles and convictions and are still clinging to their party. It is a hopeless struggle that will come to nothing. Those of their number who deserted the party when their support was most needed have found no abiding place in either of the old parties. They are ostracized and distrusted. The same is true of Progressives within the old party.

The Republican Party is at this time hopelessly disorganized because of the conflicting and irreconcilable difference of views of its members on fundamental and vital questions. I had hoped it would be otherwise. I have been a Republican all my life. The party has performed a great mission. I had hoped with fervent desire that the party might be reunited and again become the champion of liberty and the defender of the principles that I believe to be necessary to the preservation of the Government. But, sir, that hope has been rudely dissipated. I repeat, nothing can be hoped for from either of the old parties as at present controlled.

The Democratic Party is just as hopelessly divided in sentiment between reactionaries and progressives. It is held together by the cohesive power of patronage and pelf and the fear of the colored race in politics. Things can not go on as they are. There must be a new alignment of political parties in this country unless one or the other of the old parties gives evidence of a change for the better. Otherwise, if this Nation is to be relieved from its present unfortunate condition, a new party must be formed. It must be founded on the principles of individual liberty and social, political, and industrial equality. It must stand for the fundamental principles of the Constitution and the independence and sovereignty of the States in local, and the Federal Government in national, affairs and for economy and simplicity in government and in private life. It must, in short, be a party of right ideas and intentions and composed of men and women who will stand firmly and courageously for the enforcement of the principles of right and justice at home and abroad. I should be glad to support such a party, unless the party to which I have always given allegiance espouses and in good faith devotes itself to the effort to bring about these reforms. It could be made the instrument of the greatest good to the greatest number of the people, redound to the glory of the Republic, and insure its perpetuity and usefulness to all mankind. The Progressive Party is discredited and disorganized. If its members, who have stood courageously for their party and its principles, would inaugurate such a party as I have indicated which would conform to their declared principles and include others of greater importance, under a new and appropriate name, it would meet with the approval of a great proportion of the American people and grow in favor if it should faithfully maintain the principles it stands for. If I were called upon to give name to such a political organization, I would call it the Liberty Party.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. President, I have taken up the time of the Senate by somewhat extensive quotations from others partly because of the extreme importance of the subject as I see it, and in order that it may be realized that the ideas I have advanced are not mere pessimistic and unfounded fears of my own, advanced now for the first time, but that they have been in the minds of leading men of the country almost from the beginning of the Government. I have called attention to them now because, in my judgment, founded in part on my service here in the Senate, the fears of the men whose utterances I have quoted are nearer being realized than ever before, and because I feel and feel very strongly the duty of calling attention anew to the patriotic sentiments expressed by these great men, and the sounding of a new note of warning from my place in this body as I am about to retire from public life with all its cares and responsibilities and its many disappointments.

Mr. President, I shall love my country and glory in its institutions and its accomplishments no less as a private American citizen than I do now as the responsible representative in this body of the people of the great State of California, my adopted home, a people than whom there are none more enlightened, intelligent, or patriotic in any of the States now forming this great Republic. I have endeavored, in my few years of service here, to serve the best interests of my State and my country. No man, no organization, political or otherwise, no interests of any kind whatever, has been my master or allowed to dictate my course or influence my action as a public servant. I have served but one interest, and that the interest of the whole people. I came into the Senate wholly independent and free to follow my convictions. I go out of it and return to my people with the consolatory feeling that I have done my best to serve faithfully their best interests. Whatever others may say or think of my service in this body my conscience is satisfied, and that means more to me than the condemnation or approval of others who have not known my innermost thoughts or intentions as I have known them. I am far from being a pessimist. I believe sincerely in the institutions of my country. I have faith in the patriotism of my countrymen and their loyalty to those institutions. Uninfluenced by prejudice, self-interest, or passion they may be depended upon to protect their country in its integrity as handed down to us by the sturdy patriots, our forefathers. I have sounded this note of warning and recounted some of the evils that are threatening the Government we all love and revere to put them on guard that they may be the better able to stand against the forces of ambition, greed, and other evils that threaten us as a Nation. This I have done with charity for all and malice toward none.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish, first, to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Stone
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Robinson	Swanson
Brady	Jones	Saulsbury	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Shafroth	Thompson
Chilton	Lewis	Sheppard	Tillman
Clapp	Lippitt	Sherman	Townsend
Clark	McCumber	Shields	Underwood
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.	Vardaman
Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Norris	Smith, Md.	Watson
Fletcher	Oliver	Smith, S. C.	Weeks
Gallinger	Page	Smoot	Works
Hardwick	Poindexter	Sterling

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST (S. 392).

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have asked the Senator from Illinois to yield for the purpose of submitting a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that there is a motion pending now; and this motion is not in order until that one is disposed of.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not making a motion. I am simply asking for unanimous consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the request, Mr. President?

Mr. TOWNSEND. To fix a date for voting on the Volunteer officers' retired-list bill (S. 392), which is the bill now before the Senate. The motion pending is one which would displace it. I am asking for a date upon which to vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] will object to that consent at this time, and for that reason we are wasting time to call the roll. We will call the roll, and he will come in and object. He stated to me yesterday that he would not consent to it; that he was going to object.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Georgia does not object?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not objecting at present. I have not heard it read.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask to have it read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., on Thursday, January 11, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 392, a bill to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War Volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes, and at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on said day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that on the said day of January 11, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask the Senator not to press that request at this time. If we can get through with this resolution indorsing the President, and have a couple of days' opportunity for debate clear, I will not object to a consent order to vote upon the Senator's bill. I say I will not object if we have two days of clear debate ahead of us.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had understood the Senator to say that he would not object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say I will not object if we have a clear two days' debate ahead of us. At present I do not know when we are going to be allowed to vote upon this resolution with reference to the President's letter; and until we see what direction is given to that matter I would rather the Senator would not press his request for consent, but I think we can consent a little later.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand the Senator, then, to object now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not want to object, but if the Senator presses his request now I will. I do state, however, that if we can have a clear field for two days of debate upon the Senator's bill I will not object to consent; and I will not take time in discussing it in such a way as to prevent a vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course the Senator understands that the order proposes five full days.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; it does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We may not get any of them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There are five legislative days between this and the day fixed for the vote in the proposed agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, objection is made, then; is it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

PEACE OVERTURE.

Mr. LEWIS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The speech entire is as follows:

Mr. Lewis's Reply To Mr. Lodge.

SUBJECT: RESOLUTION OF INDORSEMENT AND APPROVAL OF SENDING PEACE NOTE TO WARRING GOVERNMENTS (S. RES. 298).

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to reply to the address of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I reply at once, upon the moment of his conclusion, that I may set the Senate right on what I feel to be the only question that is before it for its immediate consideration. It is no purpose of mine to impose upon this body, which has been more generous to me than my deserts ever called for. A physical weakness, due to late illness, may cause me to proceed at times not wholly audibly. I trust no Senator will have any hesitancy to let me know of such, in order that I may aid him in hearing what it is my purpose to say.

Mr. President, we have all listened to a very edifying discussion from a very eminent Member of this body, the Senator from Massachusetts. It has contributed information brought from his long service in this body, to which there were contributed the results of his acknowledged learning.

But, Mr. President, I am strongly impressed with the fact that many of the things discussed by the able Senator from Massachusetts are far afield from anything that needs to be considered by this body upon the mere resolution of the Senator from Nebraska. I am inclined to warn my colleagues, if I may be pardoned the audacity, against being taken away from the just consideration of the only thing that is properly before them by expressions of convictions that may relate to other matters of interest, perchance, but not now necessary for present consideration.

May I be bold enough to remind the eminent Senator from Massachusetts that a distinguished predecessor of his—to whom he is a worthy successor—Daniel Webster, on the floor of the Senate, replying to Hayne in the great discussion which preceded that deplorable holocaust of our Civil War, reminded the body that when a mariner had found himself far out upon his waters, he turned to his chart, to his compass, to get his bearings, and from those set again anew his sails. I trust the Senate may agree with me that it will be a rewarding diversion for us to turn to the chart and from it see from where we are sailing and to what port.

The resolution, Mr. President, presented by the Senator from Nebraska, which is the only thing now for the consideration of the aye or no of this body, reads with clearness and exactness:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. President, where is a sentence, aye, or a word, in this the only question before this body which calls for the approval of any of the propositions of the message of the President or invites this body into the consideration of their effect in the present status or in the future condition of the world? Where is there a word in this resolution from which the distinguished Senator could have asserted that there is before this body at this time a serious obligation imposed upon it by the resolution "to take all the risks of world complications" which he has so graphically pictured; where any phrase bringing us to the consequences which he fears or embarks us on all those unprecedented courses for which before in the history of our Government there is no parallel? The act of sending the note is what we approve—not the solutions suggested in the note.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield gladly to the junior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator in view of what he has just said if it is his contention that the passage of this resolution does not approve by its terms the note except wherein it suggests or recommends that the belligerent nations state the terms upon which they will agree to peace?

Mr. LEWIS. I reply to the able Senator from Nebraska by saying that I read the resolution as one that only "approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the notes," which notes are described as being those which suggested and recommended the nations to state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator quite answers me. Perhaps he did not quite gather what I referred to, or perhaps I was not quite plain. I judge from what the Senator has said that the words in the resolution as follows, "suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed," describe the only part of the note that we would approve by our action. I concede that we might put that construction on it, although as I have looked at it, it seemed to me the words were rather descriptive of the note itself than that we intended to go no further than approve that part of the note. I think the Senator will admit that there were other things in the note besides that. I wanted to know whether the Senator put that construction on it, and whether in his judgment if we pass the resolution unamended we would by our action only approve that part of the note which suggests and recommends that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I reply to the Senator from Nebraska that I am compelled to differ from both his premises, reading the note as I do, and yet I confess that he is correct in saying that the construction which he puts upon it is permissible from the viewpoint that one might take from first blush. I reply that this resolution neither assumes to approve the calling for terms of peace nor does it assume to ask this body to approve the other portions of the message as on the phase of a world peace alliance upon which the Senator from Massachusetts has adverted. My contention is that the resolution in its very plain words imposes upon this body the sole duty of approving or not approving, indorsing or not indorsing, the action taken by the President in sending the note, asking that peace shall be entered upon in some form of consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the junior Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think, then, that the adoption of this resolution would mean the approval by the Senate of everything contained in the note?

Mr. LEWIS. In no wise whatever do I construe this to be a resolution asking the Senate at this time to approve the matters defined in the note. Knowing the ability of the distinguished Senator who presented this resolution, I can not but conceive that he recognizes that our time for approval of the contents of the note or of the terms of peace are after they have been carried into some effect and submitted to us for ratification, either upon our request or in the course of legislative procedure. I therefore reply to the Senator that to my construction this resolution does nothing more nor goes further than merely to approve the President of the United States in sending a note which asks for such terms or to suggest such terms as might bring about peace. It does not assume to ask this body to enter into the terms of the note, to approve of the terms specifically or otherwise.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, as I understand it, the Senator's view is that the passage of this resolution by the Senate does not put the Senate on record as approving the contents of any note but simply approving the fact that a note has been sent.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator has correctly stated my position.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to ask the Senator if he would approve the sending of the note utterly irrespective of what it contains?

Mr. LEWIS. For myself, I approve of all that it contained; I approve the action; but I am answering the distinguished Senator from Nebraska as to what this imposes on the Senate. It does not call for the Senate to do that which I have done, approve the action and approve the contents, and it only approves the sending of the note, which did call for the suggestion of some terms upon which peace might be reached.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator, then, wants the Senate just to approve the dropping of it in the post office, irrespective of what was in the note?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator's assumption that this is a mere approval of dropping it in the post office assumes two facts—first, that it was dropped, and, second, that it was in the post office. I will not admit the premises. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska upon a more serious suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator puts the construction upon the resolution that it does not commit the Senate to any other thing stated in the note. Would he object, then, as an amendment to the resolution, to a proviso which in substance will provide that nothing in the resolution contained shall be construed as an approval by the Senate of the contents of the notes?

Mr. LEWIS. Permit me to say to the able Senator it is not my resolution. I do not feel that I should express any assent or dissent as to what amendments might be offered to it. When such is tendered and the Senator who is the author has expressed himself, I will then assume to express, if I feel I should, any view I have on the amendment. I trust the Senator will pardon me at this time, as I do not feel I have the liberty to accept for his colleague an amendment.

Mr. President, then I turn to the only question, as I see it, which is before the Senate, and that is this resolution calling merely for the approval of this body of the sending of a note asking the belligerent nations to suggest some terms upon which peace might be reached.

Mr. President, I want to address myself now to the observations of the Senator from Massachusetts upon a phase which I regard as serious and worthy both of his comment and of the conclusion which he draws. If this resolution, as the Senator deduced it, contains matters which involve us in the politics of Europe, I would agree with his dissent. If it involved us in a possible conflict with the European countries, I would agree with his protest and join him in opposition to this honorable body entertaining it.

The Senator says, drawing his deductions from what he assumes is involved, that it would plunge us into European politics, that "we would be found involved in complications in European affairs," and from that assumption he accurately concludes that it would lead us to serious conflict of a warlike nature.

Mr. President, I not only join the able Senator in the condemnation of any such course on the part of this Government, were it contemplated, but I must remind him that the party for which I speak, the men on this side of the Chamber who honor me in allowing me at this moment to be the spokesman of this side—these men and the party for which they spoke in the last controversy of politics before this Nation—were constantly presenting to this Nation the great evil there would arise if this our country under any pretense, inspired from any sources, involved itself in the conflict in Europe. We pointed out to the world the danger to America, we illustrated to our fellow citizens the great injury that would befall us; how war would ensue, death to millions of our children, and disasters to the Nation. And yet, sir, it must not be forgotten that it was such distinguished gentlemen as the eminent Senator from Massachusetts and his eminent friend and personal colleague, former President Roosevelt, who impeached the Democracy before the Nation and indicted to the condemnation of the country the President of the United States because neither would enter into the affairs of Europe and involve this country in the very destruction which the able Senator said would follow intruding ourselves into European affairs. Specifically were we indicted because we did not interfere to resent the invasion of Belgium. We were held up throughout the Nation by the distinguished Senator and his party colleagues as having shown cowardice on the one hand and lack of statesmanship on the other in not immediately going to war with countries in Europe to punish the nation which "violated"—"brutalized" Belgium.

Now, the able Senator freely confesses that the very entrance even by mere declaration on the part of the Senate—apart from action such as then was insisted was our duty—would involve us in consequences so serious in their nature that he forbids the body to enter upon so disastrous a course, even by adopting a formal declaration of a policy.

I concur, sir. I approve here the course that the President took previously, the attitude the Democracy took, the decision of the country upon it, and concur with the Senator from Massachusetts that did we embark now upon the course we refrained from, the consequences would be visited upon us as he depicts. Sir, I may be permitted to recall how we, the Democracy, had to stand as a phalanx and endure the assaults of those distinguished gentlemen represented by the Senator who held us up as unworthy of the indorsement of our countrymen or the respect of the world for not doing those very things which he now confesses would lead to our undoing.

Mr. President, I charge that the able Senator from Massachusetts, in his splendid discussion, confuses the thing that is not before the Senate with that which is. First, the Senator says that the resolution is in violation of precedent and, as he sees it, in opposition to the established custom touching the transmission of international notes. He would have us reject the resolution on the ground, among others, that it is an innovation; that it is in violation of all the established precedents which govern similar and previous courses in international affairs. Says the Senator, as a part of his impeachment, that it would have been our duty to "sound the belligerents before such a note should have been sent."

Mr. President, the Senator, though learned in international law, confuses the doctrine which applies to the suggestion of mediation with that which does apply to a mere tender of good offices.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday correctly defined the note when he said by its very terms it neither proposed mediation nor dictated peace.

This note on its very face merely tenders, Mr. President, the good offices. When, sir, good offices are tendered it is not customary—though permissible—to first sound out the parties. The contrary course is that in merely tendering the good offices it is done ex meru motu and oftentimes without knowledge of the action previously announced, lest opposing interests averse to peace would be busy to intercept the adoption of the tender.

I ask your attention to the observations of the writer on international law, Oppenheim, which are important in that he incorporates a composite definition from the many authorities he cites, saying:

> When parties are not inclined to settle their differences by negotiation, or when they have negotiated without effecting an understanding, a third State can procure a settlement through its good offices or its mediation, whether only one or both parties have asked for the help of the third State or the latter has spontaneously offered it. * * * It is during war in particular that good offices and mediation are of great value, neither of the belligerents as a rule being inclined to open peace negotiations on his own account. * * *
> Diplomatic practice frequently does not distinguish between good offices and mediation. But although good offices can easily develop into mediation, they must not be confounded with it. The difference between them is that, whereas good offices consist in various kinds of action tending to call negotiations between the conflicting States into existence, mediation consists in a direct conduct of negotiations between the differing parties on the basis of proposals made by the mediator.

Therefore the able Senator condemns this note by those precedents and doctrines which apply to tenders of mediation, which in themselves propose the terms upon which the others should agree to peace.

Mr. President, in order that the able Senator may realize this, I call his attention to a matter with which he can not be unfamiliar, historian that he is, with a view of establishing that the President of the United States has performed with exactness a duty strictly along the lines of the established precedents and not at all in violation of them. In 1812, when war was between the United States and England, Russia tendered her offices as mediator; and, notwithstanding the fact that Russia at that time was in an alliance with England, England through Lord Castlereagh declined her offices. Sir James Mackintosh, it will be recalled, announced that the reason of the refusal was because Russia tendered herself as mediator, and not her good offices.

Thus it must be plain that the distinction is clear, which the Senator must have overlooked. The Senate will recall that in 1835 Great Britain presumed to mediate the dispute of the United States and France over the spoliation treaty. No notice was either given to France or the United States; yet, of this offer, Jackson, who was then the President, said in his message of February 22, 1836:

Of the elevated and disinterested part the Government of Great Britain has acted, and was prepared to act, I have already had occasion to express my very high sense.

In 1838 the United States instructed its minister at Paris to acquaint the French Government of the readiness of the President to afford assistance in his good offices to bring to an end the controversy between France and Mexico. This without any previous notice to either party or to their ambassadors. The President said that he "would feel no delicacy in tendering his good offices, and was only then deterred by the knowledge that the British Government had offered its mediation."

You will observe, therefore, Mr. President, whenever we tendered good offices we did it as the President of the United States did it in this case, without sounding, without information, to the parties previously.

But, Mr. President, we will have occasion to note with much more interest the precedents cited by the able Senator against us. Says the able Senator from Massachusetts, that there is the precedent of 1860 and 1861. The Senator refers to an effort made on the part of the Governments of Europe to intrude themselves into the Civil War between the States. He says that such suggestion of offices of peace was rejected on the part of the United States. Mr. President, upon casual reading it would appear to the ordinary person that the historical incident cited by the able Senator was a parallel, and would serve to impeach in its course the conduct of the President of the United States in this particular instance. But, sir, I must invite the Senator that here again he has confused a situation—a tender which in no wise is a precedent or affording in any wise a parallel to convict the President of the United States of having conducted the matter before the Senate in any irregular form whatever.

What, sir, were the circumstances of the rejection by us of England's advances? I beg to call to the able Senator's attention that, first, when the Civil War was on there had but six months of conflict expired when England had already given indications of her willingness to aid the South in secession. She had extended both her sympathies and her approval to the seceding States. She was therefore no longer neutral. Her attitude was known to all our Government.

Then the able Senator will remember that, through one of her officials, she was bold enough to suggest that the war between the States be settled upon a theory of what she contended was a previous expression of Mr. Lincoln—of allowing certain States to hold their slaves, and suggested through this official that that policy be presented to us, which would have recognized limited slavery in America. These things could not be without the knowledge of Mr. Seward; they could not be without the knowledge of President Lincoln.

Then, sir, what was her international attitude? It was not to tender their good offices. Surely the able Senator must recall it was that they offered to mediate; they tendered themselves—both France and England—to mediate, and themselves offered terms of peace between the States.

Sir, France previously to that had clearly indicated through one of her officials that in the discordant condition of our severed States it would be a timely occasion to recover much that was lost to France in the Louisiana Purchase; and one officer of England boldly proclaimed that in our dissensions Canada would be able to recover all of that country in the American Northwest called the Oregon country which had been lost to England in the diplomatic dealings between the United States and England. Sir, these may have been impetuous and unauthorized declarations, yet, sir, do you not recognize that with this knowledge, how impossible it was for the United States to accept these intercessories when they offered to mediate, presenting their terms of peace, when it had been charged that on the part of one the terms were secession and slavery and on the part of the other an opportunity to acquire what had been lost them through negotiation and diplomacy on the part of the United States? Then, sir, it was because of that that the United States declined any suggestion whatever of mediation.

Referring to a letter of Charles Francis Adams in his autobiography, let me read that which time did not give the Senator opportunity to read, that which specifically Mr. Adams calls attention to; the fact that in the communication from Mr. Seward the expression was "if these nations shall intimate to you, interfering in our internal affairs." I appeal to the Senator that he has inadvertently misquoted the history of the time that he might thus give to the country color to the plea that a Democratic President was ignorant of history, of parliamentary procedure, and of international law on the one hand, or defiant of the proper course to be taken by America on the other.

Mr. President, there can be some excuse for a Senator, rising on the floor in the heat of debate or when summoned at the moment, either misinterpreting or misstating historical matter or that which is registered in the books, but there can be little excuse on the part of learned men who, with previous convictions on the one side of a controversy, proceed to justify them to themselves by condemning the officials of an opposing party as lacking knowledge of the preceding events that should have guided conduct, and offer to sustain their contentions by that which was clearly without application, or, in so far as it did apply, was a misconstruction in all its terms.

Mr. President, I am not interested much as to whether the President of the United States conformed to precedent or whether he did not. So far as I am concerned, sir, I charge that of all offenses which have been committed against liberty and justice in America there have been none greater than that idolizing of precedents which have no application to modern events and which slay the spirit of things by too much adherence to the letter. Yet, sir, if the President of the United States is to be adjudged before the country when indicted from such eminent sources on the ground that all of the precedents of the past in a matter similar to that which he has transacted have been violated, then I rejoin that there must be stated the truth to the historical fact in order that men may judge the President accordingly by it, truthfully and justly.

Then, Mr. President, the able Senator calls attention to the fact that when Germany and France were at war there was a suggestion made of peace through the United States in one form or another until it reached our minister asking that the United States should intercede; that this was by us repelled. I must say that there the able Senator again leaves the record in a condition most misleading if it is tendered as a precedent that shall serve to denounce our action now. I invite the Senator's attention to history, assured, as I am, that his knowledge will justify me. The war between France and Germany of 1870 and 1871 had proceeded at length. Then came the suggestion not that we tender our good offices as the President has done in this case, but that we join with European powers in offering mediation. It was this, which was so violative of all the policy of America joining with European powers in a matter that might lead to terms of peace which would pledge us to enforce them afterwards. This was the thing that was declined by our Government. President Grant in his message adverted to this and called attention specifically to the fact that he was compelled to decline, because it would have been in violation of the whole policy of this Government to have entered into negotiations in conjunction with foreign countries and make ourselves an ally with some of them and participators and mediators in partnership with kingdoms of Europe. Is there any parallel between that and the present case? I answer none. Then, sir, let it be remembered that Mr. Washburne, our minister then in France, in his declaration sent to this country, said that the whole subject matter was declined because it was a "contest over dynasties," and, as it was such a contest, our country could not enter with Europe to decide which dynasty of Europe should control. Is that any parallel to the present situation of our offer? I again answer no. I must insist that the very able Senator has confused these precedents if he can fancy in them in any wise whatever an application and parallel to the instance that is now before the Senate.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the able Senator to the letter of Secretary of State Fish to Bancroft, our minister succeeding Washburne, and invite his attention to the fact that in that very communication specific direction is given as to what especial course we should refuse. He says to the minister:

If the British Government shall in any way approach you, directly or indirectly, with propositions which assume or contemplate an appeal to the President on the subject of our internal affairs, whether it seems to imply a purpose to dictate or to mediate or to advise, or even to solicit or persuade, you will answer that you are forbidden to debate, to hear, or in any way receive, entertain, or transmit any communication of the kind. You will make the same answer whether the proposition comes from the British Government alone or from that Government in combination with any other—

There alluding, no doubt, to the attitude that had been taken by France.

If you are asked for an opinion of what reception the President would give to such a proposition if made here, you will reply that you are not instructed, but that you have no reason for supposing it would be entertained.

Mr. President, I think we must see that in all the precedents cited by the very able Senator there is no parallel to either; there are no precedents in any; there is nothing to impeach the course taken by the President, which was merely tendering his good offices, and that by the United States alone.

Mr. President, I now call the attention of the Senate to a corroborative historical fact. It is that immediately after we had declined to enter into an arrangement with the nations of Europe as joint mediators we promptly, in one year thereafter, in 1872, expressing ourselves to the Governments of South America through Secretary Fish, the same Secretary, serving under Grant, previously declining to mediate in Europe—Secretary Fish in his note to Mr. Clapp, the special envoy of our Government to Bolivia at Buenos Aires, referring to the difficulties between Brazil and the Argentine Republic—which also involved Bolivia and Paraguay—said, voluntarily, sir, without consultation with either Government and without sounding either:

The Government of the United States feels a deep interest in the permanent peace and prosperity of the South American States, and will not refuse to exercise such influence as may be proper to secure an amicable settlement of the difficulty which has unfortunately arisen among some of those countries.

Mr. President, can there be a misunderstanding of the justification of the President sending this note—or, sir, of the situation in Europe which he seeks to end? Can anyone of all Christendom fail to see what this condition of martial array means to the world? Behold, my colleagues, those armies as they stand confronting each other, awaiting the order for extermination! Do you realize, gentlemen of the Senate, that there are more men prepared and ready for encounter to the death, summoned to the war fields of Europe, than were marshaled in the whole world of conflict from the downfall of Rome 400 years after Christ to the invasion of England by the Normans in the year 1000? Do you appreciate that there are more armies and men awaiting the order of decimation and destruction than were in all the combined armies of the earth as recorded in history from the time of Waterloo to Appomattox? Can you realize that the navies cradled in the seas from the Baltic to the Bosphorus, straining upon the leash of their anchors, fretting to consume each other, are more in their fighting force than the combined navies of all the earth in all the conflicts in all the time from the Spanish Armada in 1508 to Trafalgar in 1805, and more in power than all the combined fleets of the whole civilized earth in all the battles of naval conflict from Trafalgar to Manila Bay in 1898?

Surely, the scholar of the day, or the casual man of the times, would charge it as recreancy on the part of any man in power if he could have spoken to avoid the result of this annihilating collision had he failed to do so.

Then, sir, what are the good offices that the President of the United States, in such surroundings, submits? It is not, sir, that we submit terms of peace to the belligerents; not that we ask them to submit their terms to us; nor that we ask them to join at this particular time with nations other than themselves. We merely ask them that they shall among themselves, only to themselves, propose between themselves anything which to either would be satisfactory as the terms of peace. How else would terms ever be arrived at in any conflict? From the pettiest lawsuit which arises in the puny courts to the conflicts arising to the dignity of world affairs there must be the approach on the part of some contestant by the expression of that which would satisfy before the other would know whether it could be accepted or rejected.

Has any other course been attempted here? Might I not ask the able Senator, as I would anyone else, in what way would peace ever be had in all the period of time if it shall not begin in the only way in which peace ever begins, by an advance through some one in behalf of those engaged in the conflict? If the position of the able Senator be well taken, then, sir, I do affirm that there can never be an hour when any man in any place could appropriately approach the question of peace. There would be none to whom he could submit the desire. There would be none to speak for those who would have the desire. There would be no agency to initiate in the world. Parties would be left to the conflict to the interminable end, until death was the inheritance of all, and the spectacle of civilization in destruction to be all that was left of mankind.

But, Mr. President, I pause here to recall that the able Senator from Massachusetts found it agreeable, at this time and in this portion of his condemnatory remarks, to criticize President Wilson and Secretary Lansing for a matter which, if well taken, was so beside the great discussion which he had entered upon that I marvel that so great a mind could have descended to such an infinite particle. Says the Senator: "Here in his message the President says that neither of the belligerents had ever submitted their cause of war in detail to definitiveness." Correct the reading was; and then said the Senator, by way of parenthesis, as if he could not resist the opportunity of hissing that sarcasm which is so famed in this body and so effective at times—said he: "It is not customary to criticize the course of those with whom you expect to negotiate and of whom you are asking peace; but," says the Senator, "of course in the new dispensation such seems to be permissible."

Indeed, Mr. President, the words of the President of the United States which were the subject of this flash of cauterizing satire on the part of the distinguished Senator were these: "That there had not been stated concretely and definitely the exact terms for which each was contending," and then he added that in a general way they had been stated. Yet it was because of this that the Senator could not resist the opportunity afforded him to make his criticism personal upon the Secretary of State and the President as those not only wholly lacking in information as to the precedents of international law, but of good manners and good form.

Mr. President, I am not here to offer defense of the President of the United States in a matter touching his private conduct in dealing with his fellow man. I must assume that the history of his life, as recorded in all his acts, answers this, and that the altitude he occupies as an educated gentleman before the civilized world refutes any necessity of an advocate. Nor shall I enter upon any defense of the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, as to the manner of his compilation, his composition, or his method of presentation of a state paper. But this much I beg to call to the attention of the able Senator, that if criticisms are to be indulged as to the want of proper delicacy on the part of officials who are of the state diplomacy, then I am delighted, sir, certainly content, to make comparison between this paper and its method and that other form of diplomacy indulged under President Roosevelt, when with the form of a bludgeon a nation could be seized and ravished of one of her children, and the act justified upon the ground of power enough to enforce it, which deed of saw-and-ax diplomacy cost us millions on millions and now to cost more and more in our money and much in the friendship of all South America. Or, sir, of that Secretary of State, not long since in office—and an official colleague of the Senator—who, while treaties submitted by him to the Senate were pending before this body and while he was seeking the approval of the Senate of them, could find it agreeable to write letters impeaching the integrity of intention on the part of some Senators and impugning the veracity and intelligence of others. A late biography of a distinguished former Secretary of State is too fresh in the minds of eminent Republican Senators not to recall that when one enters upon the field of disquisition and criticism of niceties of conduct of a Democrat, merely because he is such, they might have reflected and seen themselves as others see them, and then observed in the words of Hamlet, "Look upon this picture, and now upon that."

Sir, I have nothing to reply to the able Senator's definition of our administration as "new dispensation." I do not know exactly to what he refers, unless he refers to the new public practices that are now in vogue in the Government—that is, by the order of the new administration. If this is what he means, then I admit, sir, there is a new dispensation, and if my humble approvals are heard in the chancellery of heaven I thank God that there is this new dispensation. I find a pleasure in dwelling, sir, for a moment upon the fact that our whole country has welcomed this new dispensation. This dispensation that has ushered in a new era when no longer a few chosen ones are allowed to distribute among themselves the privileges of the Government, when no longer diplomacy is conducted through such secret methods that the Government may be involved in consequences of danger and loss of honor without any knowledge on the part of its representatives of the acts or of the results until too late to avert either.

I welcome the fact that there is a new dispensation that speaks bluntly, forcibly, truthfully, and no longer indulges in the subterranean intrigue of falsehood and pretense to achieve that which only open justice in a democracy should ever accomplish. But I can not resist calling to the able Senator's attention the fact that this new dispensation, twice submitted to his country, returned in 1914 the largest Democratic majority to this Senate it has ever known since it was constituted, and, sirs, that with international affairs and the method of our dealing with them before all America; and, sir, in the second and last controversy over this new dispensation, in which the distinguished Senator daringly and brilliantly led the assault upon us, the Nation evidenced its approval by a plurality of more than 500,000 of citizenship, surely testifying that the new dispensation has received the approval of the country as a dispensation of justice to man, profit to the Nation, and glory to the Republic.

Mr. President, the able Senator, however, has now another objection which he urges to the imaginary resolution which his splendid faculties invent as being before the Senate. Says he: "This message has been construed in many quarters to be favorable to Germany."

Mr. President, it may be so. I can hardly imagine any document, in a crisis like this, that would not receive its construction from one side or another. There are always those interested from one viewpoint or the other. There can be no expression on the part of a judge in a trial of a cause but that one litigant can see an aspect against him or for him, and the friends of the litigant indulge that sympathy of construction. Surely, then, there can be no expression from the President of the United States upon a matter so grave as this but that those interested could readily draw from it a construction, and thus indulge the construction by making accusations. But if all of that be true, Mr. President, shall that defeat the purpose, merely because there might arise a construction on the part of those who find it gratifying to themselves to indulge it? Shall this prevent the undertaking? If that were so, there never would be a time, I must say to the able Senator, when anything whatever could be undertaken, anything whatever be begun, because everything would be susceptible of construction one way or the other.

Now, I say to the able Senator, let us reverse the situation and assume a paper probably issued by himself, meaning ever so well the neutrality which he professes here is the creed of his action; but were it issued by the able Senator, will he deny that there would be those who would promptly say, "On its very face it is intended to favor the allies"? Could anybody hear the distinguished Senator's observations, if they desired to be unfair to him or to misunderstand him, that could not impute to his message that form of construction? And yet, shall every effort he would undertake to bring about peace by making a suggestion be wholly withheld because of fear that the other extreme of construction might be applied?

Sir, I can not accept such as a reason why the message should have been withheld, why the expression should not have been given forth, and why the effort, sir, should not have been undertaken. Yet the Senator says that it is construed in behalf of Germany. I must say to the able Senator that I can see, in that observation of his, the real reasons for much of his opposition. There are those who have allowed their race prejudice so to overcome their sense of justice that they can see nothing in the effort to obtain peace but some result that may serve in some way to favor Germany. There are those who, feeling that peace might inure to the benefit of Germany, would rather defeat it than to have it. As we see from the distinguished friend of the Senator and eminent statesman, the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, in his declaration of this morning, he, too, finds the same construction, and for such reasons only, if we read aright, would defeat the peace of the world. They would rather have no peace than one that might inure to the benefit of one of the nations, Germany. Surely, sir, such is not the spirit in which we should approach the discussion upon this resolution, a declaration which only seeks to approve the efforts on the part of the President to bring the nations together that they may speak among themselves for peace to the world and justice to their people—"a consummation devoutly to be wished."

Mr. President, I want to thank the Senators for moving that I be allowed to break my reply address, as my physical health called for some rest. I appreciate the consideration voted me.

I turn my attention specifically to the remaining reasons urged by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] why this body should not adopt the resolution tendered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I refer now to those objections not met by me yesterday before recess.

First, I should like the attention of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], if he should be in the Chamber. I understood the junior Senator from Indiana to ask the able Senator from Massachusetts during his address if there had been any resolution tendered on the floor of the Senate approving the action of President Roosevelt in the note sent to effect peace between Russia and Japan. If I did not misunderstand the Senator from Massachusetts, he said that there had been no such resolution, and that he had never heard of resolutions of that kind in a legislative body; and sincerely and with great force he presents his objection to this resolution on the ground that this resolution, among other things, offers an innovation in that it brings the legislative body in concurrence with Executive action in the tendering of good offices and mediation previous to the acceptance of such. It was this course which to the Senator's judgment was a violation of good legislation on the one hand and of just form and propriety between the Executive and Congress on the other.

I beg to say, Mr. President, that the able Senator either had forgotten the history of his country or for the moment was not advised. I ask the attention of the Senate while I call attention to the proceedings in the administration of President Johnson. I read from the diplomatic correspondence, which contains the matter sufficiently to avoid repetition by reading the legislative proceedings.

The letter from Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, to our minister, Mr. Hale, representing us in South America, is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington. December 20, 1866.

SIR: It is known to the belligerents that the war which has for some time been carried on between Spain and the allied Republics of Peru, Chile, Bolivia, and Ecuador is attended with deep concern to the people and Government of the United States. On more than one occasion the President has called the attention of the belligerents to this interesting fact and has rendered such good offices as seemed practicable with a view to bring about a pacification. These tenders have not hitherto been definitely accepted by the parties. The House of Representatives of the United States, concurring with the sentiments of the President, on the 17th of December, instant, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas wars destructive of commerce and injurious and prejudicial to republican institutions have for some time been carried on between Spain and several of the South American States on the Pacific coast, and also between Paraguay and Brazil, Uruguay and the Argentine Republic on the Atlantic coast: Now, therefore,

"Resolved, That it be, and hereby is, recommended to the executive department of the Government that the friendly offices of this Government, if practicable, be offered for the promotion of peace and harmony in South America."

The President is thus called upon by the most numerous branch of the legislative department of the United States Government to renew the efforts which he has heretofore made. I have, therefore, the honor to submit, by means of this circular letter—

A copy of the resolution.

Mr. President, I beg to call attention to the fact that preceding the introduction of this resolution in the House of Representatives the President of the United States had tendered his offices to Spain and to South America. The offices had not been accepted; and while the matters were pending, and before there had come any conclusion, and when it appeared to have lapsed, the House of Representatives passed a resolution in two forms—one approving, tendered by Mr. Bingham, which was passed unanimously, and then the second resolution, requesting the President to resume the subject, and then tendering its approval of his efforts of mediation.

Therefore it can not do to have it go out to the country as a fixed fact that the procedure attempted here is without precedent, and that it is such an innovation that it is equivalent to intruding the legislative branch upon the executive work without any previous precedent or authority in the legislative records of our Nation, and that for such breach of established custom should be denounced.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. The senior Senator from Massachusetts is not present; but I think the Senator from Illinois—quite unintentionally, of course—has quoted the senior Senator from Massachusetts entirely too broadly in the statement he has made. I am quite sure that if the Senator will read the report of his remarks as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 3d of January he will find that the Senator from Massachusetts at no time and in no place made the assertion that there had been or was no precedent or that he had never heard of such a legislative proceeding as that now in contemplation.

If the Senator from Illinois will pardon me, in order that the RECORD may be correct, I will take the liberty of reading a few words that the Senator from Massachusetts did utter in that regard:

I do not remember that any resolution was passed by either House of Congress indorsing and approving the action of the President. The President was acting wholly within his right as Chief Executive, as the present Executive is acting, and it was not sought by him certainly to project the Congress of the United States into the negotiations, if you choose to call them so, or with the good offices he had offered in hopes of bringing the belligerents together.

I feel that that statement should be made, because I know that the Senator from Illinois would not intentionally misquote the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion of the junior Senator from Indiana, but call his attention to the concluding portions of the very able Senator's address, where he inveighed against what he insisted was the great evil of attempting to intrude Congress in these matters, which, I am sure the Senator will recall, the able Senator from Massachusetts insisted had not a precedent or parallel, but was what he would have had us understand to be a violation of all the precedents of the past. But now I have brought to the attention of the Senate a condition very similar, and one which had received the sanction of the more numerous branch of the Legislature, as the Secretary under President Johnson says, so that we can readily understand, sir, that the action now before us is one highly sanctioned by most approved authority.

But, Mr. President, I have a more serious matter, apart from these precedents, as I have concluded with them. So far as the mere precedents are concerned, I would not have presented them at all, save that I could not accept the assertions of the able Senator from Massachusetts. I realized, or thought I did, that he was in error. But his very high position, because of his long service upon the Foreign Relations Committee, would incline the country to believe he must be wholly accurate by virtue of the opportunities he has had to become informed; and thus we on this side of the Chamber would have been held up as either being ignorant of the history of our country or, with knowledge of it, doing something in defiance of it.

Mr. President, I then have this to say, sir: There are the precedents; here are the distinctions; there are the established international laws—I may paraphrase the Roman:

> Upon these stones I build a new temple, and cry out to the gods: "Let that of Janus be now closed."

Mr. President, here is the resolution. It is here now for action. I have sought to set forth all that it brings to the attention of the Senate. You are to vote it up or vote it down.

I then submit to the Senate the condition whether you would or would not have had this resolution is not a matter that I wish to enter upon now. That is fruitless.

> It's an ill moment that dwells on things done,
> As though to be undone when undoing can not be done.

Whether you believe this resolution precipitates the Senate into a new form of investigation or not, that, too, as I see it, is beside the inquiry. The question is what are you going to do with it?

Mr. President, the very debate on this resolution, brought about in its necessity by the opposition to its passage, has done more injury to this cause of peace which the President of the United States has sought to give impulse and force to, than any other form of opposition which has arisen from any source in all the United States. The very testimony presented from this body that there were those gentlemen eminent in the councils of the Nation speaking for great constituencies who found reasons of any nature to justify them to oppose encouragement of the President of the United States to bring about peace is an indication to portions of the world that there are men in our Republic who would find any reason satisfactory to avoid the peace of the world. They will ask themselves what motive could there be behind such, and these, thousands of miles distant from this Chamber, will reply that either it was because the power of those who make riches on war was so potent, even in this Senate, that they could continue war that they might benefit in the continuance of riches as a result of war, or, Mr. President, they will conclude the other, that race prejudice has grown so strong in this land, built up of all the nationalities now at war, that these distinguished representatives in this great tribunal were not able to divorce themselves from these influences far enough to give an encouragement to the President of the United States to bring an end to this universal slaughter of mankind. Then shall it be said hereafter that Senators in this body opposed the President receiving from his coordinate branch a mere encouragement of his efforts, a mere approval of sending his note soliciting peace, and tendering his own good offices to effect it. Shall this be said—when our action might have helped to stop the murder of men, the profaning of women, the starving of children?

Mr. President, the opposition to this resolution will be construed in those spheres of kingdoms and monarchies as indicating on the part of this body an expression of such partiality to one belligerent against another that we were content to continue the war merely for the object that it might beat down to destruction one of the combatants, that the victor might exult in the vanquishing of its foe.

Mr. President, I therefore must say to the Senate, as I see it, that though this resolution may not meet the approval of the distinguished Senators from the mere point of some legislative propriety, though to them it may offend against the thing you call precedent; aye, admit that it may not be anything which you yourself would have introduced, for reasons of your own; yet I must urge, Senators, that we are not dealing with a matter local to the United States only. This is not a matter where there is an issue only between our political parties at home. This is not a subject where there is a mere division between our fellow citizens in America. This resolution tendered here presents to you the interrogatory, will you before the world disapprove the action of the President of the United States, your President, in his effort to secure peace among the warring nations of the earth? All pretense of reason, Senators, all devious distinctions presented by you as your excuse for opposition, will all be lost sight of by those in the opposite part of the world, indeed throughout the civilized world, who will merely behold the result of your action. This, and this alone, will be the test of what was meant by your conduct. It was to defeat your President.

Some of you may not agree with the President of the United States in many public attitudes. Many of you may oppose the position he takes on things called political; but where is that valor and patriotism in the heart of an American which is always distinguished in the United States by the quality and the capacity to lay aside partisanship in matters of the welfare of our country against foreign opposition—where is it, if it can not be invoked in such an hour as this, and what shall be the test of it if it shall not be that you can surrender little differences of form and these grievances conjured up by prejudices in order to achieve the great result that is sought, of putting power behind your own President in his desire to give impulse to the movement of peace; not, sirs, in behalf of party, not in behalf of politics, but in behalf of humanity? His action is the action of the country. His voice is the voice of America, and she speaks this day as the ambassador of God for peace—that divine attribute which can ever be justified by whatever means the intelligence of Christianity may accomplish it.

Then, say I, Senators, what will you do with this resolution? What will you do with all the objections, conceding them to be well taken? Will you adopt them for the gratification of your opinion, for the pride of your idea, and reject your own country's effort while you hold your President up to where he will be, in the eyes of the world, repudiated by his own countrymen? Will you scorn your own President before the earth? Is there so little pride left in the bosom of America? Is there so little sense of patriotism abounding in the souls of America's children that we could do such a wrong? Surely if any man anywhere asks you to do such, would not you respond in the reply of that sacred source—"Is thy servant a dog that he should do such thing?"

Yet, says the Senator from Massachusetts, we must defeat this resolution, as he concluded his forceful presentation in behalf of his objections, and what reason does the distinguished Senator finally urge as the uttermost and most commanding? The able Senator found it agreeable to his sense of propriety to read a mere newspaper report of a speech of Count Andrassy, of Hungary, in which speech the count is reported to have said that terms of peace acceptable to Germany were in the hands of the President, and then to set forth to some degree the presumption of what the contents were. Mr. President, of that matter I have no knowledge. I have been educated in a profession that forbids hearsay testimony to be tendered against any person at all. I am strongly wedded to the doctrine that hearsay testimony of hearsay testimony surely would hardly be presented for acceptance by one recognizing those rules.

But if all this the Senator assumes were true, what of it? Why is that matter presented by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts? My answer is that it was presented as corroboration of the previous assertion which the Senator made that these proposals of peace are to favor Germany and were construed in certain quarters of the Republic as having that purpose. The Senator read those extracts from the speech supposed to have been delivered to fortify his accusation; but, sirs, why make the accusation at all? It was for the object of having the country at large understand that the peace proposal of the President was at the instance of Germany, and that, too, notwithstanding the President's assertion in his message that such was in no wise true. It was to give the country the impression that this move of peace was a purely partial undertaking, wholly in the behalf of one of the belligerents, and that Germany. The object was clearly on the part of the distinguished Senator to prejudice the impartial consideration of the cause. The Senator has a right to have a feeling personal to himself upon this subject. I concede that he has the right to espouse his feeling and express it at certain places.

But, Mr. President, I can not accept the purpose of the Senator as being one justified in this forum under the circumstances in which it was evidenced to my mind. Clearly the object was to awaken in this country an effort of opposition by those who are opposed to Germany, by those who are friendly in any nature whatever to the allies, all under the charge that this proceeding was in behalf of Germany, and by such accusation invite all these, whoever they were, to bring their combined influence on their Representatives and Senators to defeat the approval of the action of the President. It could have had no other service.

Never did the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts do a more adroit and artful piece of work than in that particular portion of his presentation. But it could not have escaped the sight of those who were viewing it; it could not have failed of understanding by those who were observing it.

Mr. President, I am not for Germany. I am not for the allies. I am for America! I am for those things which execute the policies of my country. But, sir, I would not let prejudice, if I had any for or against any one of these belligerents, influence me to stand against the peace that might be brought forth by any source to continue life to humanity and save it from universal death.

Mr. President, if it be true, as is charged in certain quarters, that the object of any one of these belligerents is to establish a military despotism upon the present institutions of liberty, then I abhor it. I would despise and fight any people or government in any part of this world who would slay the institutions of civil liberty, that upon its wreck it might build the empire of militarism. But because there are those who make the accusation I can not condemn a whole nation of people.

Then, sir, says the Senator as to these proposals of the President, whatever they are, that if this resolution shall pass here it will approve the proposition for peace, and the Senator says this proposition of peace, if accepted and yielded to, would mean but a temporary peace. Mr. President, if I could concur with the able historian and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts I would say, in the language that assailed the ghost, "Avaunt! thy specter is frightening."

But I hold just to the opposite. Mr. President, speaking for myself, I can never subscribe to the doctrine that permanent peace can ever be had by beating down a people either with war or hunger until the very last of its children in subjugation must surrender to avoid destruction. That does not make peace. It was Tacitus who paraphrased the Egyptian when he said, "Ye make a desert and call it peace." I hold, sir, that it is only when a people are encouraged both in the overtures as well as the measures of peace—encouraged, Mr. President, to survive, to live and feel that the star of friendship is hovering just above them, that it may again light their paths to a future of joy and love, that peace can be assured as permanent. I can not believe that there can ever be a permanent peace to any country when it shall have been beaten down to such desolation and degradation that it must swear its children, as Hamilcar did Hannibal, that to those to be born there should be the oath to recover the lost pride and to avenge the suffered humiliation.

Sir, it is that that has brought the very present war of the world upon civilization in this hour. How well we know the Holy Scriptures have been fulfilled, that there is nothing new under the sun. In 1799, when Napoleon Bonaparte came to the very apex of his power, there had been, as we all recall, much war between the Government of France in different forms and that of England. There was then pending the proposition to bring in four more allies in behalf of France, three more in behalf of England. Note you, sir, that there was then addressed to England the following communication by Bonaparte:

> Called by the wishes of the French Nation to occupy the first magistracy of the Republic, I think it proper, on entering into office, to make a direct communication to your Majesty. The war which for eight years has ravaged the four quarters of the world, must it be eternal? Are there no means of coming to an understanding? How can the two most enlightened nations of Europe, powerful and strong beyond what their safety and independence require, sacrifice to ideas of vain greatness the benefits of commerce, internal prosperity, and the happiness of families? How is it that they do not feel that peace is of the first necessity as well as of the first glory? These sentiments can not be foreign to the heart of your Majesty, who reigns over a free nation, and with the sole view of rendering it happy. Your Majesty will only see in this overture my sincere desire to contribute efficaciously for the second time to a general pacification by a step speedy, entirely of confidence, and disengaged from those forms which, necessary perhaps to disguise the dependence of weak States, prove only in those which are strong the mutual desire of deceiving each other.

Napoleon and those in behalf of him went direct to the question without those forms which the able Senator from Massachusetts said were always necessary, which you will observe were not regarded so in 1799.

Now, sir, may I invite the attention of Senators around me, educated in history, not to forget that Charles James Fox, rising in Parliament and moving the acceptance of the overtures of Napoleon, said, if I recall his speech, that it was peace that was the natural state of mankind; that any peace that gives promise of renewing people again in friendship and making permanent the past peaceful relationship of men ought to be adopted. Sir, it was in opposition to this that William Pitt combated the overtures of peace and refused to sustain the resolution tendered in Parliament by Buchanan, appealing to His Majesty to take up negotiations to the overtures; and, sir, what was the ground of this opposition?—almost as if the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts had lately refreshed his learned mind and adopted Pitt's reasons for those of the Senator. It was that the making of peace or encouraging of it at that time would only lead to temporary peace; that the only peace which would be permanent would be after the nation which he charged guilty of perfidy, having for its object the destruction of civilization, had been beaten down to its knees. He was then speaking of France. Sir, he prevailed and Fox was defeated, and overtures of peace were rejected. As a result of this, sir, we have it that from 1799 to 1814 wars in 11 different forms were revived between France and four of her allies on one side and England and three of hers on the other. More than 3,000,000 human beings went to their graves, while gentle France was deluged in the blood of her own sons, and noble Britain sat in tears like Niobe, and wept as Rachel for her children, "who were not."

Mr. President, to this very hour we can connect the war now pending between France and Germany in which England and France participate, and note the same allies that participated from 1799 to 1814. All related, it appears, to that policy which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts indorses, that there can be no peace justified nor even to be tendered until one of the nations has been beaten to such humiliation that it could not decline. I can not accept the standard of the able Senator. I must view history as must any other scholar and realize that those creeds and those doctrines were those which have precipitated wars endlessly to generations unborn.

Sir, the Senator, tendering to his part of the Chamber his reasons sufficient from his viewpoint, says that this note of the President and this resolution, if I use his words accurately, would place us in the position of entering upon matters of peace of which, says he, we have no interests at this time. To use the exact words of the Senator, "at this time of the war we have no interests in this peace." Sir, does my distinguished friend, the eminent scholar of government, really mean to tell his country we have no interest in peace terms at this time? Will the distinguished Senator turn to Massachusetts, long the mother of liberty and the mistress in the vanguard of justice and peace, and say to her, with all that she has contributed to the building up of this Republic, that we have no interest in the terms of peace of these warring nations of Europe?

Sir, why did we buy the Danish islands? It was because the scholars of government on both sides of the Chamber realized the necessity of hastening the bargain, even yielding objections which previously had been made of so potent a character that they had been effective—for be it well understood that if this war of the belligerents in Europe should come to a termination suddenly the peace terms would involve transfers of territory. Having not a friend among the belligerents, these transfers would partake of the character of the transfer of islands owned by the belligerents in such parts of the sea as were adjacent to our hemisphere and which in the hands of those whose theories of government were opposed to a republican form would be harmful to our interests and which we could not approve.

Shall the able Senator be indifferent to the fact that if these peace terms were now to be brought to negotiation, with the attitude of all nations an enemy to us, and there should be an attempt to transfer the Marshall or Caroline Islands to a nation inimical to the United States, and which by its course of conduct or its principle is opposed to the policies that we must keep in effect in South America, we could supinely submit to it? Would we not, then, be called upon to protest after the event had been concluded? Then, would we not protest in the very face of all of those who were opposed to us?

Sir, it may be that some one nation now might be opposed to some of our policies and some one nation or two nations, sir, might oppose some objection of ours touching a transfer of any of those islands in our seas; but, sir, when the terms of peace had been consummated and the treaty had been effected, then every country once engaged in the war and now making peace would be behind the execution of the treaty to enforce it; and all of them combined would then be the united opponent of America.

Shall the able Senator say to this body that we have no interest in the terms of peace when one contemplates the aspect of the possibility of possessions passing into the hands of one victor or another that would jeopardize our rights in the Philippine Islands, threaten our security in Hawaii, and run us the risk of embarrassment in Alaska? Surely, if such were attempted we would have to raise our voice; and, further, if persisted in, our hand.

Then, sir, it can not be said that we have not an interest in these peace terms. Surely the Senator spoke beside his thought and could not have meant really and seriously to say to this Nation that at this time we, with all our interests, circumnavigating the globe and interlocked with all creation, have no interest in the final verdict of mankind and in the disposition of civilization in this war.

Sir, this is a great moral question. Our entrance into it is an entrance as an agency of morality, as the voice of Christianity. The President of the United States is to be admired by an unselfish thought and applauded by an impartial world for having taken this commendable step.

Sir, is it remembered how long this war has continued and that no voice has spoken? Will it be ignored how long the President of the United States has waited; how he has waited for any other head of any other Government on earth to have spoken first? Since, sir, there was this silence on the part of every monarch, every ruler, every president, should the President of your country, which you have dedicated to the brotherhood of man and the religion of Christ, be silent in the presence of the noblest sacrifice of the cross—the birthday of the Master, the Prince of Peace? The President sanctified this Christmas season by his holy call for "Peace on earth, good will to men."

But, says the able Senator, this message has one great objection why we can not give approval to the adoption of the resolution. Says the Senator, there are expressions from four officials in connection with this message which say there would be war between this country and some of those countries abroad. Mr. President, we have heard read by the Senator from Massachusetts what he said were the explanations of those expressions by the Secretary of State. The Senator from Massachusetts would have us understand that the expression on the part of our official that there could be war was offensive for that it was without foundation, and that if we pass this resolution we would indorse that charge. I say to the Senator I agree with him in the speech he made in Lynn, Mass., on the 16th day of March, to the Republican Club of Lynn, where he announced his candidacy for the Senate, which was ratified by the people of Massachusetts. After arraigning this administration for which I speak—arraigning the President, whose course I indorse, in the policy now before this body—he specifically charged us with not properly guarding the future that was surely on its way to war, and he said to his people—I read from a paper friendly to the Senator—

> The peace of this country would have been far better kept, we should be in far less danger of war to-day, or war when peace comes among the warring nations of Europe, if we had kept it—> without humiliation, kept it in honor and without fear.

Then I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts as the authority to justify the assertion of the Secretary of State. For myself, Mr. President, let me say, upon my authority in the place where I stand, assuming to bind no man, that I agree with the sentiment expressed from any quarter—the Senator from Massachusetts or the Secretary of State or from any other observing man—that this war can not continue without America being involved in the conflict.

Mr. President, we have seen three nations enter on each side of this conflict who were not in it at the time it began, but whose interests became so involved as the war was enlarged that they were caught up in its flames and are this day suspended in the fate of either consuming their opponents or being burned to ashes in the conflagration.

Do you feel, Mr. President, that here in this Nation the people of this country are in such temper that they will ever again allow any commander of ships, captains of armies, officers of diplomacy, cabinets of war lords, or censors, to visit upon this country an injury to its citizens or its property and escape upon the excuse of a misconception of orders, on the one hand, or an excess of zeal on the part of the officer on the other? Sir, let us be truthful. In the excess of our generosity to maintain the peace of this Republic we accepted those explanations from different countries of the world, but if those conditions shall again be repeated America will not again accept that form of apology. She will resent and, to the extent of her power, punish a repeated wrong to her people or an insult to her Nation. No amount of logic for pacification would avail when America is again aroused to an offense deliberately done her.

Then, sir, you must see that if there have been from high sources expressions of the fears of war it is well grounded in all experiences of the past and in these very illustrations of the war in Europe.

Sir, I say the continuance of this war in Europe will mean war with the United States. I have never a doubt that in the wise comprehension of the President of the United States, in the sagacious forethought of the officers of the administration they were impelled to bring peace to Europe, that we might maintain peace in America.

But, says the Senator from Massachusetts—and here I come to the conclusion of the last of the able Senator's strong objections, which I greatly respect, however much I may differ—that in this note there are other reasons which are sufficient to reject this resolution. The able Senator would have the United States of America understand that there was a proposition in this message that after the war America was to join with other nations of the world in some kind of league for the purpose of using force to enforce the claims or the rights of smaller nations, and he would have us believe that in this there is a threat in the message that would wholly destroy the Monroe doctrine. Mr. President, if I correctly gather his logic—though he did not express it—it is that by entering into any understanding with any other nation we would give them the right, under the courtesy and privilege of such understanding, to come into this hemisphere and exercise their authority in the affairs of America as we had assumed to do in the affairs of the small countries of Europe.

Mr. President, with very great respect to the intuition and sagacity of the able Senator, I defy his skill of analysis to lay his finger upon one single word, far less sentence, that justifies that conclusion. I must defy his capacity of definition to lay his finger upon one phrase that would justify that deduction. What are the words which the able Senator would have us understand justify him in this fear? These, Mr. President, are the words in the message, that we will do all that is in our power to command to aid in the protection of smaller nations in their rights. Senators, I ask, is there anything new in that assertion? What does the distinguished historian statesman—the President—mean? This eminent historian in the White House is not ignorant of his country. This man—Woodrow Wilson—began first as a student of history, then he became a teacher of history, and now he is a maker of history—will he be ignorant of the policies of his country, the unwritten constitution of America, the Monroe doctrine? No. The expression, Mr. President, was not only not new, but one we have often indulged and enforced to the full extent of our power. There was no intimation that we would command beyond our power; that we would assume to violate our power; that we would transcend it. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to recall that when Greece was struggling for her rights against the tyranny of monarchs nearly a hundred years ago, and fighting against the persecution of power, Henry Clay, of Kentucky, tendered a resolution that these United States give every aid to the full extent of her power in the protection of the rights of Greece. Who supported this? Daniel Webster, from Massachusetts. Surely can it be that the incorporation of this very language has become an affront to the successor of Daniel Webster, who now occupies his seat?

Therefore, Mr. President, remembering my observation to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I beg to call to your attention the fact that the Monroe doctrine is not only guarded by the expression used and our Asiatic policy preserved, but every theory of a republican form of government essential to our preservation is as secure now, and will be in the future, as it has ever been in the past. Nothing in that message by word or line can give to the able Senator, or any other man of judgment, justification for the fears he has expressed, though it is commendable in every man, if he thinks he sees an indication of that kind, to denounce it, or, if in a proposition, to oppose it, and defeat it with every power at his command. But, sir, the Senator summons up these obstacles of invention and tenders them here to defeat the approval of the act of the President, which this day I say would be as regrettable a deed as could ever curse the honor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I have done with the objections urged by the distinguished Senator. Here is the resolution, and there is the undertaking of my President, with whom I differ as to many things, to whom in genial conversation I have often expressed those differences; but he was chosen to decide these questions that are placed within the Executive disposal, and not I; and when we differ, if he still contends he is right in matters of presidential prerogative, his duty is to enforce his view, because he must bear the responsibility; and I stand to support him because the country chose him to enforce the duty and commands us, whenever we can with conscience, to execute the will of the ballot box and give to him strength and support in the execution of the policies with which they have intrusted him. It is for that reason that I would waive any formal or partisan objection I might have to the passage of a resolution like this, and give it the distinction of a unanimity of approval that all the world may see that when an American President, be his party politics whatever it may be, shall call for peace, all of his coordinate branches of Government, all of his country, in one grand unison shall echo back hosannas of peace. Never, sir, would I permit, far less present, that which is shown here; an aspect of obstruction, which will never escape the accusation that it is born of partisan opposition, with the object to defeat the little credit that might come to this man or his party for having brought about peace. Or, sir, that other and more dangerous aspect of having yielded to that racial prejudice that has poisoned our people against fairness and deprived a great nation of the spirit of justice.

Sirs, America does not command by force of arms the peace she yearns for. She does not summon to obedience through the trump of terror. She calls in the voice of kindness, and speaks with the tongue of friendship. America would melt every flash of the sword in the gleam of the cross and smother every roar of the cannon in the hosannas of happiness. By her example of prosperity and happiness, springing from the blessings of religion and the faith in the purposes of men, she beseeches the world to hearken to the President of this Republic, who speaks the voice of his country, calling to the warring nations of the earth, "Let us have peace."

Mr. President, England's great commoner, John Bright, speaking in Birmingham, England, in 1862, apostrophized this, our America. Said he:

> I have a bright vision before my gaze. * * * I see one vast confederation, stretching from the frozen North to the glowing South and from the wild billows of the Atlantic westward to the calmer waters of the Pacific main. I see one people, one law, one language, and one faith, and all over that wide continent the home of freedom and the refuge for the oppressed of every race and of every clime. From this bright spot shall be proclaimed the peace that shall soften the world and assure happiness through the union of love to all God's people.

Sir, we, too, have our vision, and in it dream our dream. We behold our America enthroned in her virtues, presiding as the mistress of the fates of the world. She sits in the court of nations as mediator of their differences and arbiter of their grievances; this our country vanquishing force by scorning its use. In her brow glows the star of justice that will illumine where war had blackened. About her heart is the shield of honor, in her hands neither spear of power nor the scepter of authority. She will but sway her wand of love, and beneath this will arise the genii of trust and faith to lead the nations of the world to peace, justice, and liberty—the mission of America to mankind. [Applause from the galleries suppressed by the Chair.]

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My motion that the resolution be laid before the Senate has not yet been put, and I ask the Senator if he will yield for that purpose?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course, I would prefer to speak directly to the question, but I can only speak for myself when I say that I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall have an opportunity to present the matter directly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for a vote on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is, Shall the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska be considered instead of the unfinished business?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when the name of Mr. SAULSBURY was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan], and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand on all votes for the day.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BECKHAM. Has the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with that Senator and withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a pair with that Senator. As I can not obtain a transfer, I shall withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that my colleague, the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 27, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. 298) submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK December 22, 1916, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the action taken by the President in sending the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war suggesting and recommending that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some days ago I offered a proposed substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I now desire to modify it to the extent that will be found in the draft which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amended substitute.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the substitute previously submitted the Senator from New Hampshire offers the following:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States, in the interests of humanity and civilization, expresses the sincere hope that a just and permanent peace between the warring nations of Europe may be consummated at an early day, and approves all proper efforts to secure that end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I address myself to this subject with admitted embarrassment. If it were a subject dealing exclusively with matters concerning our own Government and our own people, I should feel at ease in expressing any views which I might entertain with regard to it. I realize, however, that this subject affects other people more vitally than even our own; and I think I appreciate, in part at least, that it is almost impossible for us to view this matter from the angle of vision from which it is viewed by other Governments and by other nations. In expressing ourselves, some things which we might say, while entirely agreeable to our own views and the views perhaps of our own people, might be viewed from a different standpoint by those of other nations. I therefore desire to premise my remarks by saying that I express my views with entire tolerance toward those entertaining different views, whether entertained here at home or abroad. I wish in no way to impeach the understanding or the viewpoint of others, but alone to give expression to the reasons which shall control my action with reference to this matter.

The President of the United States had a perfect right to send a note looking toward peace and to initiate a movement which might result in peace. He not only had the right to do so, but if there was in his possession information which convinced him as the President that such a course was a wise one, and might and probably would result in something effectual, it was his duty to do so. Furthermore, so far as this debate is concerned, in any view that I may express I shall assume, and conclusively assume, that the President had sufficient information before him, as the one representative of our Government authorized to deal with this matter, to warrant him in the belief that the step which he took was justified, and that he had given to the matter that reflection and consideration which the gravity of the subject would command from anyone whose duty it was to act in regard to it.

But if the Senate of the United States acts in regard to this matter, it will intrude itself into an affair of the utmost delicacy and of the most tremendous consequences, without any information other than that which we gather from the newspapers and from the general sources of information. If we act in regard to it at all, we will act without relationship to that part of the Government upon which devolves action at this time, without information, and without, in my judgment, sufficient reflection—that is, that reflection which should have taken place before the debate began. In other words, Mr. President, we are in an entirely different situation than that of the President; and it is no part of my purpose in this debate to assume to criticize the action taken by the President in sending this note. I hold to some rules of freedom in criticizing the action of a President in domestic matters, but when I am at all permitted to do so I prefer to remain silent in foreign matters.

If the matter had remained where, in my judgment, it should have remained, I should have felt it my duty as a Member of this body to remain entirely silent with regard to the subject matter, notwithstanding that I might have differed with the President, both as to the timeliness of the note and as to its contents. Realizing, as I think I do—and I speak with entire sincerity with regard to that—that the movement was initiated with the hope that it would accomplish something, I should have felt it my duty to remain entirely silent as to the mode of procedure, either as to the expressions of the note or as to the time when it was submitted to the foreign nations. But it is here now, Mr. President, certainly by no choosing of mine, and I am called upon to cast a vote which, if in the affirmative, in my judgment, as the resolution stands, will obligate me to a course which does not at this time commend itself to my judgment, and particularly to statements in the note with which I am in utter disagreement.

I do not admit, Mr. President, since this resolution is here voluntarily, not at the suggestion of the President, but purely as the voluntary act of the Senate, that I am in any sense whatever assuming to criticize the President for the performance of his function and of his duty by disagreeing to the resolution and thereby disagreeing to the contents of the note. I am justified in that position, I think, by the fact that if this matter had been sent here at the suggestion of the President, or by reason of a message from the President, a different situation would present itself. But coming solely from the action of the Senate, without any suggestion upon the part of that particular official who, under our form of government, has to deal with this matter at this time, it seems that we may deal with it with entire freedom, and without being placed in the position of assuming to criticize those who have viewed it from a different standpoint and with different obligations.

I read this morning in the New York papers that the President's Secretary is authority for the direct statement that Mr. Wilson is entirely indifferent as to what the Senate or the House does about the peace note. I have every reason to believe, in view of the silence of the Chief Executive, that we are permitted to dispose of this matter according to our own judgments and our own consciences, without being placed in the position of criticizing the action of the President.

As I say, however, the note is here, and we have to deal with it and with all its contents under this particular form of resolution. It brings up for discussion and consideration some of the most important questions with which this body has had to deal since the beginning of the Government. I would like my colleagues to reflect upon this proposition that if this note contains the language which I believe it to contain, having the meaning which I understand it to have, initiating an entirely new policy on the part of this Government, when this body and the House pass upon it, then that department of the Government which fixes the policies of the country will have approved and initiated a new policy.

If the note contains what I believe it to contain—an expression of view with reference to our foreign policy in the future, an entire change of policy with reference to our foreign affairs—and this body and the other member of the legislative branch of the Government indorse it—it is a confirmation and an establishment, this side of an actual treaty, of the policy which is outlined in the note. There is no other step to be taken in regard to it except its actual carrying out by treaties made; and the Senate of the United States would not be entirely free to reject a treaty covering a policy which the Senate, after due deliberation and consideration, had affirmed.

Mr. President, just before the battle upon the plains of Marengo which seemed to place Napoleon well on the way of realizing his dreams of ambition, the Father of our Country was in retirement at Mount Vernon. A condition prevailed in Europe quite similar to the condition which prevails in Europe at this time. Napoleon, as I say, seemed in the way of realizing his ambition. Before his gigantic schemes thrones were toppling and dynasties disappearing; and it was understood that his plans encompassed the universal dictatorship of Europe, if not of the civilized world. Under those conditions Washington, in his retirement, wrote to a friend with reference to conditions in Europe and his views concerning them. His letter so fully expresses the view which I entertain with regard to the present situation, and so much more adequately than it would be possible for me to state it, that I am going, in the beginning of my remarks, to call attention to it. If history be correct, it was the last letter that the Father of our Country wrote upon any subject—certainly of public affairs:

The affairs of Europe have taken a most important and interesting turn. What will be the final results of the uninterrupted successes of the combined army it is not for a man at a distance of 3,000 miles from the great theater of action to predict; but he may wish and ardently wish, from principles of humanity and for the benevolent purpose of putting a stop to the further effusion of human blood, that the successful powers may know at what point to give cessation to the sword for the purpose of negotiation.

That expresses the great hope of all Americans that the great powers engaged in this conflict may realize or know the point at which the sword should give way to negotiations. In other words, while I presume we all have our views in regard to this conflict, and none of us stand entirely neutral in mind and in heart, whatever we may try to do officially, I assume that no American reflecting upon the affairs of Europe for the last hundred years wants to see any one of the belligerent powers dismembered and broken up. No one desires to see any one of the nations of Europe crushed. We hope that no attempt will be made to crush any one of those peoples. Our greatest hope is that these powers will appreciate the time when they should cease the conflict and enter upon negotiations; and, expressing my own view, at least, I trust that will be before an attempt is made upon the part of either side to absolutely crush and destroy any one of the nations engaged in this conflict.

There is one lesson of history which the people of Europe by this time ought fully to understand; that is, that whatever may be the power behind the movement or the influence which controls in the particular hour, it is practically impossible to destroy any nation where there has come to exist a real spirit of nationality. Over a century ago three of the great European powers dismembered and divided Poland. One of the rulers said, after the infamous deed was finished, that Poland had been disposed of by pen and ink; but Poland was not thus disposed of. She is now one of the vital, moving, controlling, dominating forces in this conflict, over a hundred years after. That crushed and dismembered nation has been the nerve of every revolution against absolutism in Europe from the time it was divided until this hour. The Polish patriots scattered over the face of Europe have either initiated or substantially supported the great revolutions against autocratic power from the time the autocrats of Europe divided it until now. I say, again, that the fondest hope of America is that these nations engaged in war, fighting, as they believe, for their security and their existence, may nevertheless realize the proper hour in which to lay aside the sword and take up negotiations.

Further says the Father of his Country:

> My own wish is to see everything settled upon the best and surest foundation for the peace and happiness of mankind, without regard to this, that, or the other nation.

I repeat, Mr. President, that undoubtedly every Member of this body, and I presume that practically all throughout the country have their views, their sentiments, their opinions, their partisanship, with regard to this conflict. But whatever may be our views with regard to the governing power or the ruling class in this or that country there goes out from the heart of America to all the people, to the masses engaged in the conflict, regardless of nationalities, one common sentiment, and that is one of profound sympathy for the masses of the people, regardless of the kind of government which presides over their destinies. I find a complete expression of my views in the language of the Father of his Country when he says:

> My own wish is to see everything settled upon the best and surest foundation for the peace and happiness of mankind, without regard to this, that. or the other nation.

Could there be anyone in all America so unconscionable as not to desire peace? If we should pass a resolution here merely in favor of peace it would but express the axiom of the American heart. But, on the other hand, can there be anyone so unreflective as not to want permanent peace; peace founded in justice and in righteousness, and therefore permanent peace?

Mr. President, I am going to put aside many of the minor matters which I deem to be involved in this debate, because, first, I know I shall not be able to cover them so well as they have already been covered by others speaking upon the subject; and, secondly, because I could waive in deference to the supposed cause of peace, since the resolution is here, every question involved in this note except one, and with reference to that I could not give my consent to vote for a resolution which even seems to indicate an approval of it. Since the resolution is here, though I believe it ought not to be here, I would put aside all objections save one, and that is vital and controlling, and not even in the cause of supposed peace will I seem to indorse it.

According to my limited vision of governmental affairs and the future happiness of this Nation, if I am not misled as to the contents of this note, there is a proposition involved in it of far more concern to the people of the United States than anything which we have had before us at this session or will have before us during many sessions to come. I desire to go to that, and when I shall have expressed myself fully in regard to it I will leave the subject matter so far as I am concerned, and not consume time with other matters, though they are not unimportant.

Let us not seek to minimize the importance of this matter nor undertake to delude ourselves with the thought that the issue is not here. If we are going to pass this resolution and do not want to pass upon this subject, then the language of the resolution should be changed. We shall not be able to satisfy ourselves or our people when they come to reflect upon this record that the issue concerning which I propose to speak is not an issue in this debate. The language of the note to which I have reference is as follows:

> In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.

In other words, we as a Nation are not only interested in the future welfare of the small nations of Europe, which, of course, we are, but we propose as a manifestation of our interest to make ready to achieve their protection and their integrity by every influence and every resource at our command. This means, if it means anything at all, that the Army and the Navy of the United States, the last and greatest resource for such things, will be at the command of any plan agreed upon between this Government and the nations of Europe for the protection of the small nations of that country. When the war is over, the note says, with every influence and resource at our command we will protect from violence or wrong all these small nations. Could a more stupendous proposition be presented to our people? Could a single proposition involving more completely the peace and contentment of this Republic for all time to come be submitted to this body for consideration?

Mr. President, it might be said in regard to this language that this is too free a construction of it, and that contention has been made by the brilliant Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. But the same cautious and conservative gentleman whose name is attached to this note in an interview shortly thereafter—the next day, I think—gave expression to the interpretation which should be placed upon this part of the note, and discussed freely, apparently from the newspaper reports, what it meant. Amongst other things the paper says:

> Secretary Lansing apparently favors the idea of the United States joining with other European nations in a compact to preserve peace, because he regards some such measure essential in the light of present international conditions.
> The United States is no longer in a position to remain indifferent to wars in Europe. American interests are bound to be seriously and vitally affected, as indeed they have been in the present war, and American rights are, Mr. Lansing has pointed out, necessarily placed in jeopardy.
> The views of Mr. Lansing are along the line of the statements made by President Wilson last May in indorsing the League to Enforce Peace. Mr. Wilson at that time said the present war had demonstrated that in future wars of the present magnitude it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the United States to remain neutral.

Let us go back a little further. There is an organization in this country called the League to Enforce Peace. Among its members are some of our most distinguished educators and publicists and statesmen. Its president is the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Taft. Among its members, as I recall, is Judge Parker, a Democrat of the strictest sect. A number of other admirable gentlemen are members of this league, which has a short but a momentous platform.

In discussing this matter, which I propose to do with some frankness, I may say in the beginning that I am not indulging in a partisan discussion, and, furthermore, I speak with great respect for the gentlemen who make up the membership of the league. With the president of the league a Republican, and with an agreement between the president of the league and the President of the United States upon this matter, I think we may assume that it is a nonpartisan question and discuss it from that standpoint.

I call attention to the platform of this league, for in the background of this discussion is this movement, the fountain source of this whole scheme:

> It is desirable for the United States to join a league of nations binding the signatories to the following:
> First. All justiciable questions arising between the signatory powers not settled by negotiation shall, subject to the limitation of treaties, be submitted to a judicial tribunal for hearing and judgment, both upon the merits and upon any issue as to its jurisdiction of the question.
> Second. All other questions arising between the signatories and not settled by negotiation shall be submitted to a council of conciliation for hearing, consideration, and recommendation.
> Third. The signatory powers shall jointly use forthwith both their economic and military forces against any one of their number that goes to war or commits acts of hostility against another of the signatories before any question arising shall be submitted as provided in the foregoing.

This is a proposal, as you see, to form a league composed of the nations of the earth, if they all saw fit to join it—the nations of Europe and the nations of America and of the Orient—by which all matters of dispute, justiciable or otherwise, shall be submitted either to an international tribunal or a council of conciliation, and behind it all is the pledge, through treaties or otherwise, to use the economic and military forces of the nations to enforce a recognition or a compliance with the terms of the alliance. We would be one member of that league. We would have a single voice in the determination of the issues, as to the nature of them, and so forth, and the central idea of the entire movement is the use of force ultimately in the settlement of any disputes which might arise.

The President, speaking before this League to Enforce Peace, with its platform as its creed, used this language, after discussing the desire of the nations to get together:

So sincerely do we believe in these things that I am sure that I speak the mind and the wish of the people of America when I say that the United States is willing to become a partner in any feasible association of nations formed in order to realize these objects—

To wit, the objects outlined and described in the League to Enforce Peace—and make them secure against violation.

Here is a clear and unmistakable declaration to the effect that the United States is willing to become a partner, a term of wide-reaching significance, in any association of nations, European and oriental, to insure or enforce peace, to use our economic and military forces to compel all nations members of the league to submit their affairs to these tribunals, and if any fail to do so to make war upon them. But that is not the worst of it. We agree in advance to authorize other nations to make war upon the United States if we refuse to submit some vital issue of ours to the decision of some European or Asiatic nations. This approaches, to my mind, moral treason.

A universal association of the nations to maintain the inviolate security of the highway of the seas for the common and unhindered use of all the nations of the world and to prevent any war, begun either contrary to treaty covenants or without warning, and full submission of the causes to the opinion of the world—a virtual guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence.

"Territorial integrity" and "political independence"! Now, read this paragraph in connection with the paragraph in the note and in connection with Mr. Lansing's statement and the platform of the league, under whose auspices the President was speaking, and there is nothing left to doubt. I hope the nations will understand, if they shall expect us to enter into such a program, that there are some who will have to be consulted more fully before that step is taken, and that is the people upon whom will rest the burden and with whom will rest the sacrifices involved in carrying out this new and startling program.

Senators, let us proceed further; what is the meaning of that language. When we agree to enter into an alliance which proposes by means of the military and naval forces of the United States to protect the national integrity of every small nation of Europe we have gone to the storm center of European politics. We have abandoned the policy of nearly a century and a half and entered directly and at once upon that policy which was condemned by the Father of our Country in the very beginning of the Government.

I do not complain that the President entertains these views, and, as I said a few moments ago, had they been contained in a note which bound the President alone it would have been my duty to refrain even from a discussion of them at this critical juncture. But when the note is thrown into the Senate with what in my judgment is a complete reiteration in briefer style but just as comprehensive as his statement upon repeated occasions that he is in favor of this Nation entering into an alliance with the nations of the earth to use its military and naval forces to enforce peace I am placed in a position then that if as a Member of the body I should vote for the resolution I would undoubtedly indorse the policy, something no exigency could induce me to do. I want peace. I share that sentiment with all my countrymen. I would hesitate to stand against the Chief Executive in any move which he would make in regard to it. But rather than see my country enter upon that course which, in my humble judgment, is not to promote peace but to promote war, I would oppose it at whatever cost to the cause of peace in Europe. I will not seem to court peace and instead and in fact court war. I do not know, Mr. President, how universal the sentiment is. We are told it has become practically the sentiment of the American people. I propose for my part to reflect and to repent before we start upon such a course and not afterwards.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] said there was nothing in this language which should lead us to the conclusion of the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine. If the language of the President in the note, taken in connection with his speech before the League to Enforce Peace, and in connection with the platform which he indorsed by his language, is to be accepted, let us see whether or not it would destroy or abrogate, as it were, the Monroe doctrine.

Suppose the United States and Argentina and Brazil and some of the nations of Europe enter into an alliance of this nature; suppose that Argentina and one of the Governments of Europe are unable to agree to some matter in dispute? Argentina, considering the matter vital, refuses to submit her dispute to an international tribunal or to a council of conciliation, under this doctrine of the League to Enforce Peace we would not only have agreed that the European nations could come here and engage in war with Argentina, but if we were called upon we would have to join our Army and Navy to enforce the matter against Argentina. We would join the European nation against our sister American Republic. It is an invitation for Europe to come to America to participate in our affairs and to be a part and parcel of American affairs as completely as European affairs. In fact, there would be no American affairs in the practical operation of the league, for Europe and the Orient would always control the court.

It means, therefore, Mr. President, not only the abandonment of the doctrine of no entangling alliances established by Washington, but it means the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, announced by Monroe upon the mature advice of Jefferson.

Let us see; take some illustrations which may show the dangerous course upon which we are about to enter if we indorse such a policy. I am going to use the names of some of the nations, in order not to deal too abstractly, although in doing so, of course, I am not to be considered as using them because I either fear them or would offend them, but simply as an illustration.

We will assume now that the partnership of which the President spoke has been formed, that the cooperation has been completed, and the combine and alliance has been made, and in that combination and alliance are Japan and Russia and the United States. We will assume that after the combination is made Russia and Japan have a dispute as to their rights in Manchuria. Japan insists that it should be submitted to the arbitral tribunal. Russia insists that it involves her vital interests and refuses to submit it, and moves her troops immediately to the disputed territory. Under the league alliance which we have formed and the treaties which we have made we must join with Japan in punishing Russia for refusing to submit her proposition to the tribunal. Regardless of whether it was Russia or Japan, would we brave our way across the ocean to shed a nation's blood in a war in which we had only the most general concern?

Where do these gentlemen expect to get their soldiers or sailors for such expeditions?

I am afraid that these gentlemen who talk about a league to enforce peace have overlooked in their zeal the fact that this is still a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and that they make war, make and unmake administrations, make and unmake Congresses, and they would have to be consulted. You might force through your combination—that could be done in the comfortable chambers of courts—but the men who made these treaties would not be the ones to die for them. The people would have to do the fighting, and fortunately they also do the voting.

Let us take another illustration. We will assume that Mexico has been restored to law and order and has an established government; that Mexico is a member of the alliance; that Japan is a member of the alliance; and that Mexico conceives the idea of leasing Magdalena Bay to Japan for 99 years, and we protest against it. We have already joined the alliance. They also are members of it. Mexico says, "Certainly I have a right to dispose of my territory," and Japan says, "I have a right to lease." We are all members of a common league bound together for a common purpose. Would the United States submit that question to a tribunal where it has but one vote or one voice and permit its entire future to be disposed of by a court where it has but a single representative and probably no friend, so far as that question would be concerned?

If these words which I have quoted, Mr. President, lead us in this direction we are approaching the most important subject with which we could deal with reference to foreign affairs. I have already called attention to the platform of the League to Enforce Peace. I want to call attention now to the language of Sir Edward Grey a few days ago in regard to the same subject matter. He says:

Only bear this in mind—

Speaking to those who were in favor of a league to enforce peace—

if the nations in the world after the war are to do something more effective than they have been able to do before, to bind themselves together for the common object of peace, they must be prepared not to undertake more than they are prepared to uphold by force, and to see when the time of crisis comes that it is upheld by force. In other words, we say to neutrals who are occupying themselves with this question that we are in favor of it. But we shall have to ask when the time comes for them to make any demand on us for such a thing, "Will you play up when the time comes?" It is not merely a sign manual of sovereigns or presidents that is required to make a thing like that worth while; it must also have behind it parliaments and national sentiment.

In other words, Mr. President, this has already in the estimation of these gentlemen passed beyond the domain of mere theory or of didactic discussion, that it is now a practical question of how far the United States is willing to go; and as Sir Edward Grey says, we must understand that it means force in the enforcement of terms and conditions upon which the league exists. No mere words, no sentimentality about the millennium, but force is the dominant note and war will be the ultimate result. Is this what our President meant a few weeks ago when he said this is the last European war in which we will not take a part?

We are now proposing to pass legislation which will commit this body to the proposition that we are in favor of entering such an alliance, an alliance controlled and dominated by the element of force in matters of peace.

Mr. President, Prof. Lowell, in an article in the last North American Review, says:

Many Americans complain that the league would involve our country in entangling alliances with foreign nations contrary to our traditions. It would certainly involve obligations, and those of a very grave character—obligations that might possibly result in war—and so does the Monroe doctrine.

The learned professor is frank, but with all his learning, with his great knowledge of history, I would have expected him to say "probably" result in war instead of "possibly" result in war. Before Washington committed us to the doctrine of "nonentangling alliances" America took part in all European wars. Had not it been for Washington's policy, had he yielded in the fateful hour when urged to form a European alliance, we would have participated in every war which has torn and tormented Europe from that hour to this.

It is this feature of this resolution covering this particular language of the act which makes it impossible for me to support the resolution. Now, I should like to ask the Members who are supporting the resolution if they understand that the Senate of the United States is about to indorse the idea contained in this language? I should like to ask, I say, the Senators supporting this resolution if they understand that we are about to indorse a proposition contained in this language, to wit, that we are willing to enter into association or any form of cooperation for the purpose of protecting the small nations of Europe?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not understand the Senator addresses his remark particularly to me, but I am frank to say that as far as I am personally concerned I aimed in the resolution to indorse nothing except the request made by the President on the warring nations to state the terms upon which peace might be considered.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator, since he is on the floor, if he understands this language to mean that the United States is willing to enter into an alliance to cooperate with the nations of Europe for the purpose of protecting the small nations of Europe?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it does not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from Idaho yield just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the language been modified on that point so as to exclude that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; my resolution still stands as originally presented. There have been presented a number of proposed changes as amendments. I have not as yet accepted anything.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I ask the Senator what the construction is of the language of the note where it says:

Their interest—

Referring to the Government of the United States—

Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or Government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.

Now, one of the resources is to enter into treaties for that purpose and to use the Army and Navy to that end.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I might not differ so much with the Senator from Idaho upon the construction which he places upon the note. The point I make is that the time when the Senate is to take a position upon any proposition of that sort will not arrive until it is proposed by the President or reaches the Senate in the form of a treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we may adopt a policy and carry it out afterwards by treaty, but so far as announcing the attitude of this Government toward the proposition, so far as announcing its policy, if that is the meaning of the President's note and the Congress adopts it, would it not be, so far as the adoption of the policy is concerned, conclusive upon that proposition?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not insist that my resolution indorses the President's note. I have endeavored to make it plain, in what I have said, that I aim at least in the resolution to indorse nothing except the President's request to the warring nations to state the terms upon which peace might be considered, and in my opening remarks I distinctly disavowed any desire to commit the Senate to an indorsement of anything which might be controversial or argumentative.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, assuming that the Senator from Idaho likewise addresses his query to me, in view of my observations on that subject, I desire to ask the Senator in turn, to form a reply to the query, Does he assume that the President of the United States by the use of the expression "using the resources at our command" means that he would do anything or attempt to do anything until commanded by the people, and does he assume that the people, through their representatives, would ever command anything in violation of the institutions of America?

Mr. BORAH. Well, it would not be in violation of the institutions of America if we should adopt the policy, though I think it would be an exceedingly unwise policy; but there is nothing in our institutions or Constitution or anything else which would prevent us from doing so if we desired to do it in a proper way.

Mr. LEWIS. Might I be pardoned if I asked the Senator if he would not regard the Monroe Doctrine and what it means as one of the fixed institutions of the political policy of America?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but it is one that we could abandon if we desired to do so. We announced and we can renounce it. It rests alone with the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. We could likewise, may I suggest to the Senator, abandon the Constitution if we choose and violate it.

Mr. BORAH. Let me call the Senator's attention to the language of the President. It seems that the President has already consulted with the people in this matter and he feels that the people have authorized him to act in the matter; and that being true, there is nothing to hinder him from proceeding, according even to the terms of the Senator from Illinois. The President says:

So sincerely do we believe in these things that I am sure that I speak the mind and wish of the people of America—

When that was ascertained I have no means of knowing—

when I say that the United States is willing to become a partner in any feasible association of nations formed in order to realize these objects—

What objects? The objects covered by the platform of the League to Enforce Peace, before which he was speaking—and make them secure against violation.

He has already, in his judgment, had the views of the people, and feels that in entering into this partnership, this association of nations, for the purpose of enforcing peace, he is carrying out the will and purpose of the people of the United States. It may be true that that is the will and the purpose of the people of the United States; I do not know; but I know that it is not my will, and never could be. Again, the President says:

I am sure that the people of the United States would wish their Government to move along these lines:

That is to say, carrying out his statement—

A universal association of the nations to maintain the inviolate security of the highway of the seas for the common and unhindered use of all the nations of the world, and to prevent any war, begun either contrary to treaty covenants or without warning, and full submission of the causes to the opinion of the world—a virtual guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence.

In other words, we are ready to enter into a combination to guarantee the territorial integrity of Serbia, of Roumania, and of every other small nation of Europe that may be involved in a controversy in the future.

Now, my friends upon the other side, if you desire to meet the issue fairly and squarely, you will do so by eliminating in an unmistakable way from the resolution any possible approval of that proposition. Or if you are in favor of it, if it is the position of the majority party in the Senate, that they want to enter into this league, this partnership, then we are ready to meet that issue. I insist the question is plainly here, and I do not propose that it shall be put aside. I want you to take the responsibility or renounce it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In my opinion and my understanding of the English language, no change is necessary; but the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has proposed an amendment to my resolution, and I should like to inquire whether that amendment would meet the views of the Senator from Idaho? The resolution, as the Senator from Washington proposes to amend it, would then read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the request by the President in the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

That is exactly the proposition that I wanted to put before the Senate. I think the meaning of my resolution is not essentially changed by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, and I should like to know from the Senator from Idaho whether the adoption of that amendment would obviate the objection which he finds to my resolution?

Mr. BORAH. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington is entirely a different proposition from the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, and if the Senator from Nebraska is willing to adopt the resolution of the Senator from Washington I shall conclude my remarks at once.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, if such action on my part would conclude this discussion, or even shorten the discussion, I should be glad to take it. I will say now that I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Washington is accepted by the Senator from Nebraska?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have the right to accept that amendment, I believe, under the parliamentary situation, and I accept it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say that, while I have an amendment which I have offered to the resolution, if my colleague will adopt the language as proposed by the Senator from Washington, I shall be glad to withdraw my suggested amendment and support the resolution in that form. It contains the same idea that I was trying to reach with my amendment, and, so far as I am concerned, in that form I am ready to vote for it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I accept the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska modifies his amendment by the acceptance of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I stated to the Senator from Nebraska that, so far as I was concerned, I should terminate my remarks upon the acceptance by him of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. I want to add this, however, in a brief way: In voting for the substitute which has been accepted there is language in the President's note with which I do not agree; but it is such that I should not permit it to stand in the way of any supposed aid that the passage of the resolution in its present shape might be to the cause of peace. I would not permit it to stand in the way of my assisting that movement. I do not want to be understood, however, in casting my vote for the resolution as approving anything in the note except the request for terms.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution as amended be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution as modified.

The SECRETARY. As modified the resolution reads:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the request by the President in the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the substitute which I offered a few moments ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment to the resolution in the nature of a substitute to read as follows:

That the Senate of the United States, in the interests of humanity and civilization, expresses the sincere hope that a just and permanent peace between the warring nations of Europe may be consummated at an early day, and approves all proper efforts to secure that end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall not occupy any time in the discussion of the proposed substitute. It is in plain and unmistakable language and is understood by every Senator. I shall, however, ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Owing to the absence from the Chamber of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). As previously announced, I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], with whom I have a general pair, I shall withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Repeating the same transfer of my pair as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to state that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained at his home on account of illness. I have no knowledge as to how he would vote if present.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Borah	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Sterling
Brady	Harding	Nelson	Townsend
Brandegee	Jones	Oliver	Wadsworth
Clapp	Kenyon	Page	Watson
Clark	Lippitt	Poindexter	Weeks
Cummins	Lodge	Sherman	Works
Curtis	McCumber	Smoot

NAYS—36.

Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Smith, Ariz.
Bryan	Kern	Pomerene	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Kirby	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.
Chilton	Lane	Reed	Stone
Fletcher	Lewis	Robinson	Thomas
Hardwick	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Tillman
Hitchcock	Newlands	Sheppard	Underwood
Hollis	Norris	Shields	Vardaman
Hughes	Overman	Simmons	Walsh

NOT VOTING—33.

Ashurst	Fernald	Lee, Md.	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Goff	McLean	Sutherland
Broussard	Gore	Myers	Swanson
Catron	Gronna	O'Gorman	Thompson
Colt	Husting	Owen	Warren
Culberson	James	Penrose	Williams
Dillingham	Johnson, Me.	Phelan
du Pont	La Follette	Saulsbury
Fall	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Md.

So Mr. GALLINGER's amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] as modified.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the resolution as it now stands be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the request by the President in the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for myself, believing that the President has no constitutional or legal right to demand that the warring nations shall state the terms upon which they will agree to peace, I shall vote against the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. POINDEXTER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). Having a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KENYON (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I desire to make the announcement for the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that he is unavoidably absent. Were he present he would vote "yea."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous vote, that I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I ask to be excused from voting upon this question, and at the conclusion of the vote I will state my reason, if required.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has not voted. Having a general pair with him, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. Were he present he would vote "nay." He is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. Announcing the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the last ballot and vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise again to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. Since making the announcement of his absence on the last ballot, I have learned through his office that were he present he would vote "yea" on the Hitchcock resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is detained from the Senate on account of official business. If present, he would vote for the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained on official business and that if present he would vote for the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—48.

Bankhead	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Jones	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pomerene	Sterling
Chilton	Kern	Ransdell	Stone
Clapp	Kirby	Reed	Swanson
Cummins	Lane	Robinson	Thomas
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Tillman
Fletcher	Lewis	Shafroth	Townsend
Hardwick	Lippitt	Sheppard	Underwood
Hitchcock	Martin, Va.	Shields	Vardaman
Hollis	Newlands	Simmons	Walsh

NAYS—17.

Brady	Lodge	Poindexter	Weeks
Brandegee	McCumber	Sherman	Works
Clark	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Gallinger	Nelson	Wadsworth
Harding	Page	Watson

NOT VOTING—31.

Ashurst	Fall	La Follette	Phelan
Beckham	Fernald	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Goff	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Catron	Gore	Myers	Sutherland
Colt	Gronna	O'Gorman	Thompson
Culberson	Husting	Oliver	Warren
Dillingham	James	Owen	Williams
du Pont	Johnson, Me.	Penrose

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's resolution as modified was agreed to.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392, the Volunteer officers' retired list bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HUGHES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], who is absent. As I understand that he would vote as I shall vote, I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). On the main question I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Not knowing how he would vote on this preliminary one, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement and transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as on the last ballot and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I have made on previous occasions, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Kern	Robinson	Stone
Bryan	Kirby	Saulsbury	Swanson
Chamberlain	Lane	Shafroth	Thomas
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Tillman
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Underwood
Hardwick	Overman	Simmons	Vardaman
Hollis	Pittman	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh
Hughes	Pomerene	Smith, Ga.

NAYS—28.

Borah	Dillingham	Lodge	Sherman
Brady	Gallinger	McCumber	Smoot
Brandegee	Gronna	Nelson	Sterling
Clapp	Harding	Norris	Townsend
Clark	Jones	Oliver	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kenyon	Page	Weeks
Curtis	Lippitt	Poindexter	Works

NOT VOTING—33.

Ashurst	Gore	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Broussard	Hitchcock	Myers	Sutherland
Catron	Husting	Newlands	Thompson
Colt	James	O'Gorman	Warren
Culberson	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Watson
du Pont	La Follette	Penrose	Williams
Fall	Lea, Tenn.	Phelan
Fernald	Lee, Md.	Reed
Goff	Lewis	Smith, Md.

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 40 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PURCHASE OF FOOD SUPPLIES (S. DOC. NO. 665).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 15, 1916, certain information relative to the purchase of supplies by naval officers and employees through Government agencies, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

RAILWAY LAND GRANTS IN IOWA (S. DOC. NO. 666).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, in response to a resolution of August 19, 1913, further information relative to railway land grants in the State of Iowa, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OLIVER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lancaster County, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government on Christianity, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit liquor advertisements from the mails, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. PHELAN. I have been directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report two amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 406) to authorize the exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, or sodium, which I ask may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 7697) for the relief of the heirs of James N. Ward, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 7698) granting an increase of pension to Joseph T. Lewis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 7699) granting a pension to Jennie E. Kidd; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 7700) to place Julius Schmidt on the retired list with the rank of captain; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 7701) for the relief of John P. Blackwell; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 7702) granting an increase of pension to Margaret S. Dustin;

A bill (S. 7703) granting an increase of pension to John Doughty;

A bill (S. 7704) granting an increase of pension to Jennie A. Cressman; and

A bill (S. 7705) granting a pension to Robert A. Imrie; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 7706) granting an increase of pension to Frederick L. Ballou (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7707) granting an increase of pension to William M. Taylor (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7708) granting a pension to Alfred E. Scott (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7709) granting an increase of pension to Adam Eckert (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution, which I send to the desk and ask that it be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 190) to continue and extend the time for making report of the joint subcommittee appointed under a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," approved July 20, 1916, and providing for the filling of vacancies in said subcommittee, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the joint subcommittee heretofore appointed under Senate joint resolution 60 (public resolution No. 25, 64th Cong.), approved July 20, 1916, entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," be, and the same hereby is, continued, and is authorized to sit either during the session of Congress or during the recess, and to make its report to Congress on or before the first Monday in December, 1917.

In the event that any House member of said subcommittee shall cease to be a Member of Congress by reason of not being reelected or if a vacancy should otherwise occur in the House membership of said subcommittee when Congress is not in session, the next ranking member of the committee from which the retiring member was selected shall fill the vacancy.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. I am authorized by the Interstate Commerce Committee to report favorably upon it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume the joint resolution will not lead to any debate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think not. It provides for a mere extension of time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the request, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Nevada is for unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution reported by him from the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The resolution will go to the calendar.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask to have it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a report of a committee, which must go to the calendar, the Chair is informed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES. I want to ask with reference to the matter submitted by the Senator from Nevada. I understood that he introduced a joint resolution. Was it a report from a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was a report from the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. JONES. Or was it a joint resolution that had been referred to the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can inform the Senator from Washington that a report of such a resolution was authorized by the Interstate Commerce Committee; and the Chair presumes this is the report from that committee, authorized this morning.

Mr. JONES. I understand that it was on a joint resolution that had never been introduced; and I make the point that a committee can not authorize a report on a joint resolution prior to its introduction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point, of course, is well taken if the facts are as stated by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, Mr. President, I simply introduce the joint resolution. I will state that at a meeting of the committee I was authorized to report it favorably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment authorizing the ratification and confirmation as fee simple patents without restrictions against alienation as of their dates of issuance issued under the homestead act of May 20, 1862, in the name of Charles Cleveland and others for certain land in the State of Washington, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 18453), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ADJUDICATION OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. OLIVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 17052) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

TERM OF OFFICE OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next after the routine morning business I will address the Senate on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 177) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President without the intervention of the Electoral College, establishing their term of office at six years from the third Tuesday of January following their election, and fixing the time when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin.

POWER AT NIAGARA FALLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 186) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. BRANDEGEE conferees on the part of the Senate.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am directed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 190) to continue and extend the time for making report of the joint subcommittee appointed under a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," approved July 20, 1916, and providing for the filling of vacancies in said subcommittee, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Friday, January 5, 1917) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 6, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 5 (legislative day of January 4), 1917.

First Lieut. Elon A. Abernethy, Twenty-seventh Infantry, for appointment by transfer to be first lieutenant of Cavalry.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 5, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Fill our hearts, O Lord, with the Holy Spirit of truth, that we may be guided in things temporal and in things spiritual to great thoughts and clean living, that unperturbed by the changes wrought by time we may pass serenely on, assured that all things work together for good to those who love the Lord. Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold all things are become new. And all things are of God who hath reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an interview published in the New York Times of Sunday, December 24, 1916, with a very distinguished engineer on the subject of making nitrogen from the air.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a resolution adopted by the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce which contains some very good suggestions on how to increase our foreign trade.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing some resolutions by the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19359, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CONRY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is closed, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Salaries, Office of the Secretary of Agriculture: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; solicitor, $6,000; chief clerk, $3,000, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $3,000; executive clerk, $2,250; executive clerk, $2,100; stenographer and executive clerk to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,250; private secretary to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $2,250; 1 appointment clerk, $2,000; 1 assistant in charge of information, $3,000; 1 officer in charge of supplies, $2,000; 1 assistant, $2,000; 1 inspector, $2,870; 1 inspector, $2,250; 1 law clerk, $3,370; 2 law clerks, at $3,000 each; 1 law clerk, $2,750; 4 law clerks, at $2,500 each; 8 law clerks, at $2,250 each; 1 law clerk, $2,200; 5 law clerks, at $2,000 each; 3 law clerks, at $1,800 each; 4 law clerks, at $1,600 each; 1 expert on exhibits, $3,000; 1 telegraph and telephone operator, $1,600; 1 assistant chief clerk and captain of the watch, $1,800; 4 clerks, class 4; 12 clerks, class 3; 20 clerks, class 2; 22 clerks, class 1; 1 auditor, $2,000; 1 accountant and bookkeeper, $2,000; 1 clerk, $1,440; 1 clerk, $1,020; 7 clerks, at $1,000 each; 12 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 clerk, $720; 15 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 12 assistant messengers, laborers, or messenger boys, at $720 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $660; 1 mechanical superintendent, $2,500; 1 engineer, $1,400; 1 electrical engineer and draftsman, $1,200; one assistant engineer, $1,200; 2 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; 8 firemen, at $720 each; 13 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 elevator conductors, at $600 each; 1 superintendent of shops, $1,400; 1 cabinet shop foreman, $1,200; 4 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,200 each; 3 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,100 each; 9 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,020 each; 3 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $900 each; 1 electrician, $1,100; 1 electrical wireman, $1,100; 1 electrical wireman, $1,000; 1 electrical wireman, $900; 3 electrician's helpers, at $720 each; 1 painter, $1,020; 1 painter, $1,000; 5 painters, at $900 each; 5 plumbers or steam fitters, at $1,020 each; 1 plumber's helper, $840; 2 plumber's helpers, at $720 each; 1 blacksmith, $900; 1 elevator machinist, $900; 1 tinner's helper, $720; 1 lieutenant of the watch, $1,000; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $960 each; 50 watchmen, at $720 each; 4 mechanics, at $1,200 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 2 skilled laborers, at $960 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 1 skilled laborer, $720; 1 janitor, $900; 22 assistant messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 carriage driver, $600; 21 laborers or messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 messenger or messenger boy, $360; 1 charwoman, $540; 3 charwomen, at $480 each; 15 charwomen, at $240 each; for extra labor and emergency employments, $12,000; in all, $413,750.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph. I notice that throughout the bill it has small increases of salaries of high-priced officials, amounting to $120, but not applying generally to all employees. It singles out one here and one there. Will the chairman of the committee advise the House what policy the committee adopted other than that incorporated in the bill providing for the horizontal rise of all those having salaries of $1,800 or under?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the committee adopted the policy of allowing $120 increase in salary of those whose salaries were recommended for an increase by the Secretary of Agriculture. We did not make any general increase at all, but took only those who had been recommended for increase—some $250, some $180, some probably $300. In all instances we adopted the policy of giving them $120 where they had been recommended for any increase, except the higher-priced officials, like the chiefs of bureaus.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is satisfying, as far as these increases are concerned. I am particularly interested in the increase of the salary of the solicitor from $5,000 to $6,000, and the private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture from $2,500 to $3,000. In examining the legislative bill, we find that we pay no solicitor connected with any department—for instance, the Post Office Department, the Interior Department, or the Treasury Department—more than $5,000. Here the committee has attempted to establish a higher salary, which will be used as a precedent when the Appropriations Committee takes up for consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which carries appropriations for these solicitors. What justification can the gentleman advance, in view of the fact that the solicitors of important departments are only receiving $5,000?

Mr. LEVER. In answering the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I might say that the work of the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture for the last four years has very greatly increased, on account of the new statutes that we have passed. He must pass upon the grain standards act, the cotton-futures act, the Weeks forestry law, and so forth. He passes upon some forty-odd statutes, in addition to his ordinary routine work. We have felt that the salary of $5,000 was too small for the caliber of man who ought to be Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture. His responsibilities are exceedingly large, and in addition to his purely legal work he must be a strong administrative officer, because he has in charge thirty-odd law clerks. We felt that the salary was too small, and on that theory we raised it to $6,000. The Secretary asked for an increase of $2,500, making the salary $7,500, but the committee thought that $6,000 was a reasonable salary.

I also want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that while this statement is true, that the solicitors in other departments are not getting this salary, that most of them are getting $5,000, yet I find in the State Department the state counselor gets $7,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman must recognize that the counselor is virtually the Acting Secretary, and is at present filled by a high type of man, Mr. Polk. It requires an entirely different man from what it does to fill the solicitor's office, which requires only an ordinary lawyer of some ability.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Counselor of the State Department is the Acting Secretary of State during the absence of the Secretary.

Mr. LEVER. The Judge Advocate General of the War Department gets $6,000. The Solicitor General of the Department of Justice receives a salary of $10,000. The assistant attorney in the Antitrust Bureau gets $9,000. The assistant attorney of the Court of Claims Division gets $7,500. The assistant attorney of the office of the Assistant Attorney General gets $7,500. The assistant attorney of the Public Lands Division gets $7,500. We have felt that, with the probable exception of the Counselor of the State Department, the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture was doing work of as high a character as these other gentlemen that I have named.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, from my acquaintance with the work performed by the solicitors of other departments, who are receiving only $5,000, I can see no reason why we should make an exception so far as the Solicitor for the Department of Agriculture is concerned. Therefore I make the point of order as to that office.

Mr. COX. Are you going to make the point of order as to the rest of them?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order on the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order as to this one. Let us settle this one first.

Mr. MANN. You will have to dispose of all the points of order.

Mr. LEVER. All right.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish next to inquire of the chairman of the committee as to the increase for the private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture. The committee have increased his salary from $2,500 to $3,000. I do not find any other department where we are paying $3,000 to the private secretary of the head of a department, and I do not see any reason why we should single out this private secretary for preferential consideration.

Mr. LEVER. I happen to know the private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture quite well personally, and have come into the most intimate contact with his work. He is a young man of very exceptional ability, as I think every member of the Committee on Agriculture will agree, and he does an enormous amount of work. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that not infrequently the private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture can be found in my office as late as 12 or 1 o'clock at night, and I have never called upon him for information or help that I have not always found him ready to respond, and fully capable of service and of help.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think if the gentleman was acquainted with the work of other departments, as he is so fully acquainted with the work of the Agricultural Department, he would find some other private secretaries working much beyond their office hours.

Mr. LEVER. I have no doubt of that at all. However, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the private secretary to the Attorney General gets $3,000 a year, and the private secretary to the Secretary of the Treasury gets $3,000 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the Treasury Department the title is assistant to the Secretary, and not private secretary.

Mr. MANN. If the private secretary to the Secretary of the Treasury gets $3,000, he gets about $1,500 more than he is worth.

Mr. LEVER. I do not know about that. I have stated the information which I have on the subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on these two items in the paragraph, the salary of the solicitor, $6,000, and the salary of the private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $3,000.

Mr. COX. I reserved the point of order, and, to shut off debate, I make it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation as to the rest.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order on the item "one inspector at $2,870," in lines 13 and 14, and "one law clerk, $3,370," in lines 14 and 15. Both those items are increases of salary over last year.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman mention the items again?

Mr. STAFFORD. The salary of the solicitor, in line 5, page 2, and the salary of the private secretary, in line 7, page 2.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order and offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LEVER: Page 2, line 5, after the first semicolon, insert "solicitor, $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the semicolon, insert "private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment, striking out "$2,500" and making it "$2,750."

Mr. COX. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. COX. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The chairman of the committee [Mr. LEVER] has spoken of the valuable service performed by this man, his ability and faithfulness, and I wish to indorse and approve of all he has said. The Committee on Agriculture come in contact with many men from the Department of Agriculture, who give evidence of ability and faithfulness of service; but, in my judgment, no one performs better work or is more deserving of an increase of salary than Mr. Harrison, the young man who fills this job. In my judgment, he is entitled to the amount recommended by the committee, $3,000, but the Committee of the Whole have decided not to allow that. I hope they will allow the small increase of $250 contained in my amendment to the amendment. We have been compelled to refuse many requests of officials of the department for increases. We have recommended increases only after careful examination and where we feel we have some knowledge of the work the officials and employees perform, and we heartily recommended $3,000 to Mr. Harrison. I believe that no one who knows the character and amount of the work he does as private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture will object to this small increase we ask, and I trust that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like in the gentleman's time to reenforce the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], and urge the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] to withdraw his point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan. I had intended to do that myself, but I feared the point of order would be made, and that it would delay the time of the committee. This is a very deserving case, and this committee has been exceedingly careful in its recommendations for increases. I think except for the 10 and 5 per cent provision the total increases in this bill of salaries amounts to only 37, out of a large number of employees, and out of a large number of recommendations for increases. This, to my mind, is one of the most deserving cases among all those recommended for increase by the Secretary of Agriculture. I trust the gentleman will not press his point of order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not know the clerk; I have no acquaintance with him at all; but I concede everything that has been said here in his behalf this morning; that he is competent, able, efficient, and anything that they desire to urge in his behalf; but here we have a universal clamor going on in behalf of every clerk and every employee in the Government to increase salaries. As I said the other day, it may be that some of these underpaid employees are entitled to an increase of pay, and I am rather disposed to think they are, but is every man to be rewarded by an increase in salary simply and solely because he does his duty? Is that the only and sole ground upon which this increase in salary is urged this morning? Will it make him any more competent, any more efficient, any more effective, or any more active if this salary be increased? I think not, and I insist upon the point of order, and I intend to make the point of order on every increase of every salary here above $1,800.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the second semicolon, insert "private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the second semicolon, insert "one inspector, $2,750."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the second semicolon, insert "one law clerk, $3,250."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my impression is, and I ask the gentleman to correct me if I am wrong, that the solicitor's department and his force in the Department of Agriculture is not under the supervision of the Attorney General.

Mr. LEVER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. I think he is the only solicitor that is not under the Department of Justice.

Mr. LEVER. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that all of the other solicitors in all the other departments are officials of the Department of Justice, and it seems to me that there is some distinction between this Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, who has an independent law office, and his force, who must have the responsibility in that office of conducting the litigation in behalf of the Government. In recent years we have added to the work of the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture through the pure-food law, the insecticide law, the meat-inspection law, the various forestry laws, and a number of other laws, adding very largely to the work. Of course, that is evident from the reading of this bill, from the number of law clerks employed. The solicitor now gets the salary of $5,000, and here is a proposition presented by the committee to make the salary of one law clerk $3,370.

Mr. STAFFORD. An increase of $120?

Mr. MANN. It seems to me really with some knowledge of the law business that it would be profitable to the Government if it had several $5,000 a year law clerks, and I am not sure but if it had several $10,000 a year law clerks. All of these other solicitors may have the benefit of the work of the Solicitor General or other higher paid officials in the Department of Justice. We have made in the Agricultural Department a law office larger I think probably than any law office in the country. I am not sure that it would be larger than the law office of

New York City, but I think it is larger than the law office of the city of Chicago and probably as large as the law office of any of the great corporations, unless it be the one located in the United States Steel Co. We employ only men at very low salaries who have to compete all of the time with attorneys who receive salaries ranging from $5,000 a year to $25,000 a year. I have no complaint to make of the work of this law office in the past. I think they have probably done excellent work. I do not pretend to be able to pass upon that, but I think it is quite certain that if we are going to have law clerks—we call them law clerks, though they are lawyers—to attend to the work of the Agricultural Department and of the Government in competition with the attorneys of the railroads of the country, in competition with the attorneys of the big producers of food products in the country, and expect them to succeed in taking care of the interests of the Government, we have got to be willing to pay some increases in salaries either to keep competent men who are in office or to get competent men to go into office, because when one of these men demonstrates his ability to protect the interests of the Government in one of these cases he can step out without much difficulty into a law office outside and receive a salary of from $5,000 to $10,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I note in this paragraph there are 21 laborers or messenger boys, at $480 each, and I notice all through the bill that there are so many laborers or messenger boys or assistant messengers at very low salaries, and I wondered whether the chairman of the committee knows how many of these employees are laborers and how many messenger boys, and what they do and how long they work?

Mr. LEVER. Some of these employees are laborers, as described, and some of them are messenger boys, as described, and they work the usual Government day in Washington.

Mr. DILL. For these men, eight hours, is it not?

Mr. LEVER. Eight hours; yes.

Mr. DILL. I noted that the gentleman said in his remarks a few moments ago that there were increases provided for 37 employees in this bill.

Mr. LEVER. Of the higher grades.

Mr. DILL. Of the higher grades, oh. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he had made a computation of how many increases were made on the roll of laborers and messengers who receive less than $600 a year?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will turn to the last item in the appropriation bill, he will find we have provided for an increase of all the low-grade salaries from $1,200 down, 10 per cent.

Mr. DILL. That increase applies to a man whom you raise in here just the same, does it not?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no.

Mr. DILL. If you increase a man's salary $100 it does not apply to him?

Mr. LEVER. It applies only to those who receive a salary of $1,200 or less.

Mr. DILL. Suppose a man receiving $750 is changed to $840 in this bill.

Mr. LEVER. We did not raise anybody in this bill below the $1,800 salary except the 10 per cent and 5 per cent provision.

Mr. DILL. There are remaining a large number of these messengers or laborers, even with the 10 per cent increase, who receive considerably less than $600. Is not that true?

Mr. LEVER. That is more or less true. In some cases it would be less. In some cases, where the salaries are $600, it will be more.

Mr. DILL. Under $600?

Mr. LEVER. Quite a few.

Mr. DILL. I was reading in the hearings about men in the inspector service who receive $70 a month, and I concluded from the statements in the hearings by the members of the committee that they thought the wage was too low, as they speak of the increase in the lump-sum appropriation for that service, which, I take it, was for an increase in the salaries of those men in the inspection service.

Mr. LEVER. Let me assure the gentleman of the attitude of the Committee on Agriculture in reference to these increases. Some six years ago the committee on its own initiative, without any suggestion whatever from the Department of Agriculture, gave an automatic raise in the salaries of a large number of these lower salaried employees, salaries, I think, ranging up as high as $900, feeling that they were entitled to it.

Mr. DILL. How long ago was that?

Mr. LEVER. That was six years ago. The committee, of course, realizes that within that time the cost of living has very largely increased, but in our recommendation for the 10 per cent increase for salaries below the $1,200 grade we followed what we conceived to be the judgment of the House on that proposition as expressed in its action on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. DILL. Does the gentleman believe that a laborer working eight hours a day and receiving $40 a month, when the prices for foodstuffs and clothing and shelter are such as they are—does he think that a 10 per cent increase for that priced laborer is a proper increase at this time?

Mr. LEVER. I would say to the gentleman that my own view about that matter is this: I do not believe that the Congress can afford to take into consideration alone the proposition of the increase in the cost of living. The Congress must take into consideration the character of the work that is done by these various low-salaried employees and the proposition as to whether or not the Government is getting a quid pro quo for that service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more in order that the gentleman may answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. In addition to that I would say that personally I feel a profound sympathy for those who are receiving these low salaries, but the duty of a Congressman must be beyond his sympathy. We have taken into consideration the fact that many, many million people in the United States, as competent, as patriotic as those who are receiving these salaries, are receiving even smaller salaries. The bulk of the farmers of this country, the majority of them, are making a wage that is not much higher, if any higher, than the wage of most of these various low-paid employees.

Mr. DILL. If the gentleman will permit, he does not contend that these men can live on the same amount of money that a man living out in the country on a farm can?

Mr. LEVER. Of course not. I do not contend that at all. My contention is that the net wage of the average farmer of this country is not much higher than the lowest salary in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Office of Farm Management: One chief of office, $4,000; 1 assistant to the chief, $2,520; 1 executive assistant, $2,250; 1 clerk, class 4; 2 clerks, class 3; 3 clerks, class 2; 6 clerks, class 1; 2 clerks, at $1,100 each; 1 clerk, $1,080; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,020; 9 clerks, at $1,000 each; 12 clerks, at $900 each; 4 clerks or map tracers, at $840 each; 3 clerks or map tracers, at $720 each; 1 lantern-slide colorist, $720; 1 messenger or laborer, $720; 1 messenger, messenger boy, or laborer, $660; 3 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 1 laborer, $360; 4 charwomen, at $240 each; 1 library assistant, $1,440; 1 photographer, $1,400; 1 cartographer, $1,500; 1 draftsman, $1,440; 1 draftsman, $1,200; 2 draftsmen, at $900 each; in all, $68,430.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making some observations regarding some of these low wages. I note in this paragraph, line 19, one laborer at $360. I take it that he is one of the laborers that does not work eight hours a day. But there are a large number of the laborers in this department who are working eight hours a day at $40 a month, and they are provided for in this bill. I learned in the little investigation I have made that some of these men are so hard up for money to pay for the living for themselves and families that they have not been able to buy meat for three months because they had to provide food and shelter.

As I said before, in previous discussions of this subject, I think it is outrageous that a great Government like this should have employees working eight hours a day and pay them such miserably low wages. The chairman of this committee stated a moment ago that some six years ago there was a revision made of the wages of these employees, and for that reason, in the light of the increased cost of living, a 10 per cent increase had been made here. I would like to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks some items regarding the increase in the price of foodstuffs, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of his remarks certain statistics indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the statistics referred to:

CHANGE IN AVERAGE PRICES AND IN AMOUNT OF VARIOUS ARTICLES OF FOOD THAT COULD BE BOUGHT FOR $1, 1890 TO 1915.

To show the changes and results of changes in retail prices of food for a period of 26 years, from 1890 to 1915, inclusive, a table has been prepared from the figures appearing in preceding reports and bulletins on this subject, presenting the average price of each article and the average amount of each article that could be bought for $1 each year of the period, except for two articles—sirloin steak and rib roast—for which satisfactory data were available only for the years 1907 to 1915. A second table shows the average price of each article and the quantity that could be bought for $1 on December 15 of each year from 1912 to 1915, inclusive:

Mr. DILL. These figures show that the prices of foodstuffs have increased anywhere from 40 per cent to 80 per cent, and sometimes 100 per cent. The prices of clothing have increased in a similar manner. To say that a 10 per cent increase meets the needs of these men who are receiving starvation wages is not merely disregarding the sympathy which Congressman may have, but disregarding their best judgment also.

I shall not, Mr. Chairman, attempt to amend the bill in different places where these low salaries for employees appear, because, judging from the attitude of the chairman, points of order will be made should amendments be offered in that direction, and I do not want to delay the consideration of the bill. But I want to refer to the fact that when the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government was completed, 135 men were provided for who will be receiving less than $600 a year for the coming year, even with the 10 per cent increase added. In this bill I have not counted them up, but I know the number runs high, because a great many of these messengers do laborers' work, and I think there are possibly two or three hundred of them altogether. If we are going to increase wages, it seems to me the place to do it is at the bottom, and not at the top. If it is necessary to keep down salaries by reason of the condition of the Treasury, then the raises should be made in behalf of the men who are actually struggling to live on the salaries they receive in this country. I do not think, as I said before, that this Government should compel its employees to work at such low wages just because some outside employer may do it. The fact that they do this is no reason why the United States Government should do likewise.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Office of Farm Management: For the employment of persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere, furniture, supplies, traveling expenses, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other expenses necessary in carrying out the work herein authorized, as follows:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $237,380.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring whether, in the matter of traveling expenses, provision is made for the transportation of the household goods of such agents of the Government as may move from place to place?

Mr. LEVER. I regret to say that I am not prepared at this moment to give the gentleman that information. My impression is that it does not provide for that. I have a recollection of getting some information on that when we considered the bill last year. I think my impression is correct in that respect.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The item is a lump sum of $237,380, and it provides for the employment of persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere, furniture, supplies, traveling expenses, rent, and other expenses necessary in carrying out the work. Can the gentleman say how many persons so employed are residents in the city of Washington?

Mr. LEVER. I have that information here. I will add the figures up if the gentleman desires.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman state relatively?

Mr. LEVER. The larger percentage of these men are employed in Washington.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And are they sent from place to place by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. They are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For the purpose of investigating and encouraging the adoption of methods of farm management and farm practice they are sent from place to place?

Mr. LEVER. Yes. The object of farm management, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is an endeavor to make an economic study of farm conditions in this country in a broad, comprehensive way, with a view to developing economic facts touching agriculture in this country. It has its men stationed here and there and about in the country, some with permanent headquarters. It has many of its scientific men, its experts, its economists, located in the city of Washington, but the purpose of this is to get fundamental facts with respect to agriculture, facts which are necessary in developing the better practices and methods of agriculture in the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman how these men are sent forth? By request of individual farmers, or upon order of the Secretary of Agriculture of his own volition?

Mr. LEVER. No. The Secretary of Agriculture sends these men into various localities which appear to him to be peculiarly interesting from the standpoint of investigation and into an area which is representative of a larger agricultural area surrounding it, with a view to studying the situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, assuming that this appropriation is all right—this very large appropriation of $237,380, a lump sum, to be distributed at the discretion, apparently, of the Secretary of Agriculture, and to be paid to those whom he may designate—does the gentleman know of any like appropriation made in any appropriation bill for a similar purpose with respect to any of the other industries?

Mr. LEVER. I am not familiar with the other lines of activity of the Government, but I do know that we appropriate large lump sums in the various bureaus of the Department of Agriculture for doing the same character of work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt the gentleman is familiar with the whole agricultural situation and has never hesitated to advance it so far as he could. I commend him for that. I am not finding any fault with the manner in which the Department of Agriculture is being taken care of. But for the general purpose of information, of having the House as well as the country informed on this question, when we find appropriations denied to other sections of the country or other interests, I wanted to know if anybody on the Committee on Agriculture knows of any appropriation made by Congress upon any bill to improve the individual interests of any man or woman engaged in any other industry but agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that within his time and mine, in the last few years, we have created a Department of Labor, and have also created a Department of Commerce; that we have had a Bureau of Manufactures in existence for many, many years, and I assume that their activities are directed to the promotion of those peculiar lines of work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a fair answer. But I direct the gentleman's attention to this, that this particular paragraph, calling for the expenditure of $237,300, is for the purpose of encouraging the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, which means an individual and direct advantage to the farmer. I am asking whether the Department of Labor or the Department of Commerce does encourage anybody in industry? Does it not rather, on the other hand, retard and investigate everybody engaged in industry, and make it difficult to proceed?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know about that. I know that we have a Bureau of Mines, whose activities are in the direction of encouraging better mining practices, better safety appliances, and things of that kind, which I think is on all fours with this work here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. I direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Federal Trade Commission has recently made an investigation involving the establishment of uniform systems of accounting throughout all industry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has not that added to the expense of industry everywhere? Has it been in the interest of any particular industry?

Mr. ANDERSON. The assumption was that it was in the interest of a particular industry, and I think it was.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is an assumption from the gentleman's viewpoint. The fact is that the entire activities of the Federal Trade Commission have been an incubus upon industry, making additional trouble to industry and putting additional burdens upon industry, and they are a charge upon every individual engaged in industry. Now, if all industry is to pay $237,000 for one single item of employing people to help the farmer, why is not there some provision somewhere for at least $1,000 to aid somebody in industrial lines? Every bill passed by this Congress in recent years, certainly in the last three years, affecting industry at all, has been by way of investigation of industry, by way of additional charges to be piled up against industry, by way of retarding industry, by way of making industry more burdensome than it ever has been before. I wish the farmer well. I have said several times on this floor that the farmer is particularly favored in all legislation, and in a way I am glad he is.

The man who thinks I am not a friend of the farmer is very much mistaken. Born on a farm, interested in a farm, and hoping to die on a farm, no one can excel me in my admiration or loyalty to the farming industry. It is absolutely essential to our welfare; but I want the dear farmer, or his able and eloquent Representatives on this floor, who are here in such numbers, to know that he ought not to be continually reproaching the man in the city and taking away from him, by taxation and otherwise, every opportunity he has for profit, and transferring it bodily to the farmer by these appropriations for the employment of scientists and others to help the farmer. Let us make farming profitable. I agree to that. I have been contending that farming is more profitable than employment in the city, and I have been urging those who live and labor in the congested cities to go out on the farm. I would like to have the farmer realize a profit on the splendid effort he is making. I approve of that. I have in my hand this morning a copy of the Norfolk Press, published at Norfolk, Nebr., evidently a friend of the farmer. This paper contains an article which indicates that we do not have to make appropriations all the time for the aid of the farmer; that the farmer in some particular localities is well able to take care of himself; that his State aids him, provides for him surveys and information that he needs, and that he ought not to be constantly coming to Washington to stick his hand into the Federal Treasury for special legislation and special aid. This paper, the Norfolk Press, of Norfolk, Nebr., under date of Thursday, December 14, 1916, only a little while ago, has under large headlines an article which proves that the man upon the farm is making more money than the man in the city. If I can in these five minutes get an apportunity to tell the farmer how well he is doing in contrast with the man in the city, I am doing a good thing for the farmer; and if I can tell the man in the city what is the gospel truth, that he can make more money out on a farm than he can by sticking around the alleys and highways of the city, I may be doing him a distinct good. No gentleman will call me a specialist for making this statement, because it is national and broad in its scope. The general idea I am trying to convey is that we ought not to exalt one element of our population at the expense of another element.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We ought not to specialize in the matter of legislation. This House ought not to encourage special legislation, but it has come to such a pass here that we specialize day in and day out, taking care of one set of Americans against another set of Americans. It is wrong, it is pernicious. Some day I hope we will be courageous enough to set our faces against it. The fact is that the farmer is a very much-favored citizen of the land just now. While I do not glory in any special favoritism to any one class of people, I still glory in the fact that the farmer is prosperous. I am glad he is, even though I have called attention to those special provisions we make for him.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have only three minutes, but I yield to the gentleman. I can come in again.

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman says he is not in favor of special legislation. I would like to have the gentleman tell us what special legislation he thinks there is in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You are making an appropriation of $237,000 here to employ experts, scientists, and others to go out and educate the farmer, who seems to be pretty well educated already, and you do not do that for any man in any industrial line of which you or I have knowledge. That is special legislation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What does the gentleman think of the statement that the position of the farming industry differs from that of any other because it supplies the raw material for the food and clothing and the actual necessaries of life of the people of the country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What do I think of that statement?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And therefore it deserves and ought to receive a different treatment from an industry that is not of so vital a character to the very existence of the race.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin take the ground that because the farmer produces the raw material that he should be favored over the man who fabricates it?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am not saying that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is the gentleman's position, an issue is drawn at once.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is quite a difference between the farmer on the frontier tilling the soil, raising the raw material for food and clothing, and that of the ordinary pursuit. There may be others as important as that of the farmer, but there are a great many that can not be compared with it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think that the man who raises the cotton in boll and puts it in the bale is any more entitled to special favors at the hands of Congress than the men and women who take the raw cotton and fabricate it and put it into garments for the users of the cotton?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes, the gentleman from Nebraska to have five minutes and the gentleman from Oklahoma five minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. I wanted 10 minutes and therefore I will not ask to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have no desire to take issue with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] any further than to say that if his profession of great friendship for the farmer is true, some one should pray that the farmer be saved from his friends. I have heard many times on the floor of this House and elsewhere of the wonderful prosperity of the farmer of the Middle West. There is no doubt that he is prosperous. He is unusually prosperous at this time because of the unusual conditions which obtain in the world. He is unusually prosperous because of the tremendous war demand for his products on the other side of the sea. He is unusually prosperous because this Nation is unusually prosperous, but with a prosperity that is founded on broken homes and broken hearts. He is unusually prosperous in a prosperity builded on the grief and anguish and woes of a world. I have heard boastings of this prosperity in this Chamber, notwithstanding not a dollar of it has come to our shores that is not washed white with human tears.

The farmer of the Middle West starts his work in the morning at about the time that the gentleman from Pennsylvania goes to bed. [Laughter.] He goes to bed at night at about the time the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania rises. His long hours of work is illustrated by a story I heard not long since of some lads from the University of Pennsylvania who went out West to assist in the harvest. The farmer with whom they accepted employment went to their room on the morning following their arrival and knocked to arouse them. One of the young gentlemen sleepily asked, "What do you want?" The farmer replied, "I want you to get up." "What for?" replied the lad. "Well, we must harvest the oats," returned the farmer. "What time is it?" "It is 3 o'clock." The young man sat hastily up and exclaimed, "Great God, are they wild; do we have to sneak up on them?" [Laughter.]

The eight-hour law does not apply to the farmer of the Middle West. In the busy summer season he works 18 hours a day, and he gets less for his labor per hour than any other skilled laborer in America. He is working not only to keep starvation from the people of the United States but from the world at large. He is in a business that intimately touches more of humanity than any other business in this world, and when we make appropriations for the purpose of increasing the knowledge and science of agriculture we are not doing it in the last analysis for the farmer's personal benefit, but for the benefit of the race that must be fed. I have heard the story about the great prosperity of the farmer, and yet there are fewer men on the farm every year than there were the year before. If they are so prosperous and their life is so easy, why is the present rural population becoming less year by year? It would be an excellent idea, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if some of the men who hang about the streets of Philadelphia would go to the farm and go to work, or go to some other employment and go to work; but they will have to leave their sleepy habits behind if they are to succeed in the West. It is useless for men in idleness to criticize and carp at the prosperity of the men who have earned their prosperity by hard labor and by the sweat of their brows. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the end of the paragraph. Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered by all who heard what I said a few moments ago, that I made no personal reference to any Member of the House. I did refer to Members collectively, and I am perfectly willing to say again that I believe that Members of this House collectively ought to consider whether we should continue to enact special legislation or revise our own ideas with respect to it, and comply a little more with the spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

My friend from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] has chosen to point me out as one not friendly to the farming interests of the country, and I feel it necessary to make a brief reply. I fear that what was to be suspected from the inquiries of the gentleman from Wisconsin may be true, that some of the spokesmen of the so-called "bleeding" farmers of the country are prone to weep unnecessary tears in their eloquence before the farmer, which they must continue to shed here when they come into the Halls of Congress as the farmers' special representatives, and that they must tell us what apparently they tell the farmer at home, that he is "downtrodden," that he is outraged by the urban population, and that he must have representatives who will point him out as an object of special interest, if not of special charity, to be taken care of out of the common Treasury of the people of the United States. God forbid that I should ever come here, presumably as a representative of all the people of the United States, and plead only for those who happen to be in my district. I will plead for them anywhere, of course, but not to set them up above the farmer, whose Americanism and citizenship is equal to theirs. Yet my friend from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] seems to assume in his statement that because I try to convince my fellow Members that we are specializing in favor of the farmer all the time, therefore I am not wholly cognizant of the farming situation. Why, I have just indicated that the papers of Nebraska, from whence the gentleman comes, and which evidently must be wet with the tears shed over the wretched condition of the farmers there, declare that the farmers of Nebraska are making more money now than are the people of Philadelphia or any other city, on the average. That statement I believe to be true; but I do not accept it as a reason why we should constantly specialize out of the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the gentleman's constituents.

I have never inveighed against the farmer, and never shall. I may ridicule some of the pretenses which I do not believe are borne out by the facts, but that I believe to be as much a duty to the farmer as to the city man. I would make the same kind of statement I am making now, without fear that any American citizen would question my right to do so, for I have faith before the law and under the Constitution in the equality and justice of every man, whether upon the farm or in the city. It has been intimated by the gentleman from Wisconsin that the farmer is to be preferred because he produces the raw material. I have asked him, and I ask anyone interested, whether the man who merely produces the raw material is to be preferred over him who with skilled energy and industry fabricates that raw material so that it may become an article of common use? Of what use to the farmer is his untold bushels of grain if there is no miller to grind it into flour to make it of value to the farmer himself?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has my time again expired? I can not get started on this question at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LINTHICUM: Page 5, line 6, after the word "management" insert "dairy inspection."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order. As I understand it, the debate is closed on this paragraph and all amendments thereto?

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from South Carolina to that effect was not submitted.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I have no idea that the sum of money mentioned in this paragraph will be sufficient for dairy inspection, though it would go a long way toward eradicating some of the evils of the milk situation in this country, and particularly in the butter situation. When we take into consideration the fact that there are to-day 2,000,000 tubercular cows in the country furnishing milk, which goes into the homes of all of the citizens of the land, we can see the seriousness of the situation, and while I do not desire to take too much time on the subject to-day, I do want to impress upon this House that it is my intention through the various organizations of this country interested in the welfare of the people to fight this dairy situation until Congress finally takes notice of how important it is to the life of the land.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's proposition is to go into the bill at all, should it not come in under the Bureau of Animal Industry?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly, it ought to come in there. It is not germane to this section at all.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I shall offer an amendment to that section also, but I want to bring before this House to-day the situation in the country as to the dairy products, and how important it is to the children of the land. We do not know exactly what has caused infantile paralysis, but signs and scientists point strongly toward the milk situation, and they bring to our attention the fact that we are not giving the inspection which the dairy interests of the country ought to have; and when I say you have 2,000,000 tubercular cows sending forth their diseased milk into the homes of this land, certainly it is time Congress was doing something with my resolution 137 which is hung up in the committee, and which it seems impossible for me to have considered. I merely bring the matter before the House to-day so that it can give consideration to it, so that we can go into it more thoroughly in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Debate has closed on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WEATHER BUREAU.

Salaries, Weather Bureau: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 assistant chief of bureau, $3,250; 1 chief clerk, $2,500; 1 chief of division of stations and accounts, $2,750; 1 chief of printing division, $2,500; 3 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 8 clerks, class 4; 11 clerks, class 3; 23 clerks, class 2; 31 clerks, class 1; 22 clerks, at $1,000 each; 10 clerks, at $900 each; 1 foreman of printing, $1,600; 1 lithographer, $1,500; 3 lithographers, at $1,200 each; 1 pressman, $1,200; 1 printer or compositor, $1,440; 5 printers or compositors, at $1,350 each; 14 printers or compositors, at $1,300 each; 1 printer or compositor, $1,200; 6 printers or compositors, at $1,080 each; 5 printers or compositors, at $1,000 each; 4 folders and feeders, at $720 each; 1 chief instrument maker, $1,440; 3 instrument makers, at $1,300 each; 3 skilled mechanics, at $1,200 each; 5 skilled mechanics, at $1,000 each; 1 skilled mechanic, $840; 1 skilled mechanic, $720; 6 skilled artisans, at $840 each; 1 engineer, $1,300; 1 fireman and steamfitter, $840; 4 firemen, at $720 each; 1 captain of the watch, $1,000; 1 electrician, $1,200; 1 gardener, $1,000; 4 repairmen, at $840 each; 6 repairmen, at $720 each; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; 18 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $720 each; 6 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $660 each; 31 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 64 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 5 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $450 each; 4 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $360 each; 37 messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 charwoman, $360; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $327,900.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why it is necessary that we should have so many messengers in this particular department. I have never been able to understand why it was necessary to have 165 messengers and messenger boys in this department.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman understands that we have more than 200 weather bureau stations in this country, and these messengers are located in connection with these stations, very many of them. A very small number of the messengers referred to in the bill are located in the city of Washington. Most of them are located with the stations in the field.

Mr. TOWNER. It was my understanding that these messengers were located in Washington.

Mr. LEVER. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,620; 1 editor and compiler, $2,370; 1 executive assistant, $2,500; 2 executive clerks, at $2,000 each; 6 clerks, class 4; 1 clerk, $1,680; 14 clerks, class 3; 1 assistant in live stock investigations, $1,600; 2 clerks, at $1,500 each; 24 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,380 each; 3 clerks, at $1,320 each; 1 clerk, $1,300; 1 clerk, $1,260; 51 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,100; 1 clerk, $1,080; 59 clerks, at $1,000 each; 2 clerks, at $960 each; 105 clerks, at $900 each; 1 architect, $2,000; 1 illustrator, $1,400; 1 laboratory aid, $1,200; 1 laboratory helper, $1,200; 2 laboratory helpers, at $1,020 each; 1 laboratory helper, $1,000; 1 laboratory helper, $960; 2 laboratory helpers, at $840 each; 1 laboratory helper, $720; 2 laboratory helpers, at $600 each; 1 laboratory helper, $480; 1 instrument maker, $1,200; 1 carpenter, $1,140; 2 carpenters, at $1,000 each; 2 messengers and custodians, at $1,200 each; 1 quarantine assistant, $900; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 9 skilled laborers, at $900 each; 1 painter, $900; 1 laborer, $900; 9 messengers, skilled laborers, or laborers, at $840 each; 3 laborers, at $780 each; 19 messengers, skilled laborers, or laborers, at $720 each; 4 laborers, at $660 each; 22 laborers, at $600 each; 26 laborers, at $540 each; 30 laborers, at $480 each; 2 laborers, at $300 each; 1 laborer, $240; 1 messenger boy, $660; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each; 9 messenger boys, at $480 each; 8 messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 watchman, $720; 1 charwoman, $600; 1 charwoman, $540; 13 charwomen, at $480 each; 5 charwomen, at $360 each; 2 charwomen, at $300 each; 7 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $440,610.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I think, Mr. Chairman, we had better dispose of the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. The matter I have in mind is the increase of salaries in this paragraph and the creation of new offices. I find that the chief clerk is increased to $2,620 from $2,500, the compiler is increased from $2,250 to $2,370, and one executive assistant, which seems to be a new office, as far as I know——

Mr. LEVER. That one executive assistant is transferred from the lump-sum roll.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the gentleman give some justification for the increase of these salaries, the chief clerk and the editor and compiler?

Mr. LEVER. As to the increase of the salary of the chief clerk, the department estimated an increase of $250. The committee adopted a policy of increasing men of this type in most cases $120 per annum, or $10 per month. The statement is made that this gentleman has been in the department for 17 years and has had no promotion since 1911, and at the same time appropriations for this bureau, of which he is a part, have practically doubled and the number of employees have increased by nearly 1,000, very greatly adding to the duties and responsibilities of the chief clerk, who, of course, is in charge of these employees.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the gentleman inform the committee what is the usual salary of the chief clerk in the departments or bureaus?

Mr. LEVER. They run at about $2,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will have to challenge that statement. The salaries for chief clerks in the bureaus range from $2,000 to $2,250, and in some exceptional cases they are $2,500, but the average is below $2,250.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is mistaken, so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. I was speaking of the other departments or bureaus.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman in the gentleman's time.

Mr. MANN. The committee has recommended increases in the salaries of a number of the chief clerks?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think most of them $10 a month.

Mr. LEVER. About $10 a month. In all cases $10 a month, except the private secretary.

Mr. MANN. I notice they did not recommend an increase in the chief clerk of the Weather Bureau.

Mr. LEVER. Was it recommended by the department?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I can not see that that makes any difference.

Mr. LEVER. As I said in my statement a moment ago——

Mr. MANN. What is the difference in the responsibility of the chief clerk of the Weather Bureau and the chief clerks in a half dozen of these other bureaus where your committee recommend an increase?

Mr. LEVER. Let me refer the gentleman to what I said earlier in the day.

Mr. MANN. I heard what the gentleman said earlier in the day.

Mr. LEVER. There was no increase except where recommendation was made.

Mr. MANN. Is it a question of personal appeal?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know the man. I never saw him to my knowledge. The recommendation was made by the Secretary of Agriculture to increase this man's salary $250.

Mr. MANN. If the chief of the bureau wants to be economical and does not ask to have the employees of his bureau raised, then there is no raise contemplated? But if the chief of the bureau is not so economical and asks for increases, then the committee gives them without regard to what they do elsewhere?

Mr. LEVER. The committee feels when the Secretary of Agriculture has made recommendation as to the salary of his own force that the Secretary ought to know more about it than the committee does.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary is a conduit through which pass the recommendations of the chief of the bureau. Suppose the chief of the bureau wants to be economical and not ask for an increase, then the Secretary does not ask for the increase. If the chief of the bureau is not so economical and does ask for an increase, the Secretary asks for the increase. I have no criticism of the Secretary. It seems to me the committee ought to consider the whole subject. If it is going to increase the salary, it ought to carry the same increase along the line, or not at all.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that, for instance, the work of the Bureau of Animal Industry is more responsible, in my judgment, than the work of the chief clerk in the Weather Bureau. The appropriation is very much larger. The number of employees is very much larger in the Bureau of Animal Industry, and I do not see that you could very well get at it except through the recommendations made by the head of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit right there? It may not be a fair question to ask the gentleman, but I would like to ask whether he thinks the work of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Animal Industry is any more responsible than the work of the chief clerk of The Adjutant General's office, who has many clerks under him and who receives only $2,250?

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman that the Committee on Agriculture is furnishing the wherewithal to feed the Army. When we do that, I think we have discharged our duties. I do not know what the responsibilities of the chief clerk of The Adjutant General's office are, and I can not say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] about a matter he knows about. He said the chief clerk of the Bureau of Animal Industry was chief of a division where the appropriation was much larger than the appropriation to the Weather Bureau, and hence the committee made a recommendation for the increase, but they made the same recommendation for an increase in the Bureau of Soils, where the appropriation is only one-third what it is in the Weather Bureau and only one-sixth what it is in the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman did not quite catch my statement a moment ago.

Mr. MANN. I got the gentleman's statement.

Mr. LEVER. I may be wrong, but I do not think I am. I did not say that the motive that controlled the committee was the consideration of the difference in the responsibilities of these places. What I did say in the very beginning was that it was the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture on this proposition which did control the committee.

Mr. MANN. That was discussed, but the gentleman gave as an excuse for the recommendation that the Bureau of Animal Industry is more important, as it is, so far as the amount of the appropriation is concerned, than the Weather Bureau. But you recommend the same increase for the Chief of the Bureau of Soils, which is an important bureau, but it has nothing at all like the amount of work to do that even the Weather Bureau has.

Now, I am not speaking in behalf of the Weather Bureau, but in behalf of a just proposition. It seems to me that it comes back to the proposition that if the chief of a division wants to prefer somebody in his division, then the committee recommends the increase without regard to the equities of the case.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me just a moment, I have a suspicion that if this committee, on its own initiative, without any recommendation whatever from the head of the department, should come in here and deliberately make these increases of salary without any recommendation whatever from the head of any department, we would hear considerable complaint on both sides of this aisle.

Mr. MANN. Let us see. Did the department recommend the 5 and 10 per cent increase?

Mr. LEVER. It did not, but the committee followed the judgment of Congress already expressed, which I think ought to be a guide to the humble Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not expressed, only implied.

Mr. LEVER. We did not act upon that proposition until the House of Representatives had expressed its judgment.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing the committee for doing it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on "one chief clerk, at $2,620, and one compiler, at $2,370."

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order, and I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LEVER: On page 9, line 2, after the first semicolon, insert "one chief clerk, $2,500."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish the Clerk would report that again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report that again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LEVER: On page 9, line 2, after the first semicolon, insert "one chief clerk, $2,500."

Mr. MANN. And "one editor and compiler, $2,250."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, in line 9, at the end of the line, by inserting "one editor and compiler, $2,250."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, on line 12, page 9, after the figures "$1,680," I move to strike out "14" and insert "13."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAMLIN: On page 9, line 12, amend by striking out the figures "14" and inserting the figures "13."

Mr. HAMLIN. And after the semicolon, in line 13, add the words "one proof reader, $1,800."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that until I can find out what it is.

Mr. HAMLIN. After the semicolon following the figures "$1,600," in line 13, insert the words "one proof reader, $1,800."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 9, line 13, after the figures "$1,600," by inserting the words "one proof reader, $1,800."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I had reserved it already.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not the latter part of the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, my information in regard to this one clerk is that his work over there is that of a "proof reader." That is exactly the work that he is doing now. In other divisions of the same department others are doing the same work and are designated as "proof readers," and are being paid $1,800 a year. This particular "proof reader" has added to his designation on the department rolls "and clerk," and is carried on the roll with the pay of a clerk, but for over nine years he has been doing the work of proof reader. That is altogether his work, and he feels, and I feel, that doing the same work that these other proof readers are doing he ought to draw the same pay. It ought to be equalized.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salary does he receive?

Mr. HAMLIN. One thousand six hundred dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps when his services as proof reader are not needed under this language he is utilized as a clerk. If it were not for that fact, no doubt the department would not make the recommendation that it has made.

Mr. HAMLIN. The department does not always discriminate and look out for these fellows. They get them pigeonholed, and they go on and do the work without proper recognition. I offer the amendment in the interest of equity as between the men over there who are doing the same work. If the others draw $1,800 for like service, then he should draw $1,800.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman from Missouri where on the statutory roll are the proof readers carried? I do not find them on the statutory roll.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know that I can give the gentleman that information. The present designation of this gentleman is "proof reader and clerk." I do not know whether he is on the statutory roll.

Mr. LEVER. In the Bureau of Animal Industry?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; in the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. LEVER. Evidently he is carried on a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. HAMLIN. No. He is carried as one of these $1,600 clerks.

Mr. MANN. Maybe he will get promotion under this bill. The bill authorizes him to get $1,800.

Mr. HAMLIN. Where?

Mr. MANN. It increases the number of clerks of class 4 from five to six. Those are $1,800 clerks. If they think he is the man who ought to get the increase, he will get it.

Mr. HAMLIN. He is in class 3.

Mr. MANN. And he is subject to promotion to class 4, and there is an increase in the number of clerks of class 4 from five to six.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not imagine that would help him, because he is a proof reader, as a matter of fact.

Mr. MANN. He will get it if they think he is the one who ought to have it. If they think he is not, then some other fellow will get it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not certain. I admit I do not know about that. I simply felt that this man ought to be paid the same amount for the same work that others are being paid over there in the department who are doing identically the same work.

Mr. LEVER. I do not think this amendment is subject to a point of order, and therefore I withdraw my reservation——

Mr. MANN. Why is it not subject to a point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I continue my reservation of the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I think we have a right to change the number of proof readers.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no law for that position. There is no such office created by the statute.

Mr. LEVER. So far as I am concerned, I trust the amendment, if in order, will be voted down, for the reason that we have provided in this bill the 5 and 10 per cent increases which are provided in the legislative bill, and no recommendation of this increase for this particular man was made from the department. The committee has no information about it, except as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] has given it to us this morning, and I feel that it would be setting a rather bad precedent to adopt this amendment. I think we can dispose of it as quickly by voting upon it as we can in the other way.

Mr. MANN. The amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see the committee have provided for a number of laborers, some new ones, at $300 each; some messenger boys, at $600 each; one messenger boy, at $660; and various other laborers, at $600 each, in this bureau. I never have been able to understand quite how they work this thing out in this bill. Generally you provide for laborers or messengers, but when you put in new provisions for laborers at $300 and messenger boys at $660, I can not quite understand the logic of that proposition.

Mr. LEVER. What line is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. MANN. Page 10, lines 8, 9, 10, and 11. You have got 22 laborers, at $600 each; 26 laborers—which is an increase in the number—at $540 each; 30 laborers, at $480 each; a new item of 2 laborers at $300 each; 1 laborer, at $240; 1 messenger boy, at $660—that is a new item; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each, and so forth. How do you draw the line, giving a laborer $300 and a messenger boy $660?

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman that all of the additions to the number of these messenger boys or laborers are by way of transfers from the lump-sum fund of this bureau. They are really not new places, but they have not been carried on the statutory roll heretofore. They have been transferred at the same salaries they now receive and under the same designations.

Mr. MANN. I do not see that that gives any information yet. If the gentleman has not got it, I have no criticism. Of course, I know that is the difficulty about the lump-sum appropriation in the Department of Agriculture. If they want to take anybody into the service they take him in through the lump-sum appropriation. Then they ask Congress afterwards to put him on the statutory roll at the salary which they provide.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman is getting at the reason for the difference in salary, I will tell him very frankly that I do not have the information. We did not make any inquiry about it. It is printed in the bill as it came to us in the estimates.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $631,560, of which sum $50,000 may be used for live stock and dairy demonstration work, in cooperation with the States Relations Service, in areas freed of ticks, and of this amount no part shall be used in the purchase of animals: Provided, however, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the purchase of materials for or in the construction of dipping vats upon land not owned solely by the United States, except at fairs or expositions where the Department of Agriculture makes exhibits or demonstrations; nor shall any part of this appropriation be used in the purchase of materials or mixtures for use in dipping vats except in experimental or demonstration work carried on by the officials or agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here is a lump-sum item, as most of the items are in this section of the bill, for $631,560, for the eradication of southern cattle ticks. This is a very large appropriation for a specific purpose. It has been carried in the bill heretofore. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill whether this appropriation is larger than it was last year?

Mr. LEVER. The appropriation is identical with that of last year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no change?

Mr. LEVER. There is no change in it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman state how many men are employed in the eradication of southern cattle ticks?

Mr. LEVER. I can not state the number offhand. Quite a number, of course.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A total of $631,560 would enable the department to employ a very large number of men, I assume.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. There are about 350.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Minnesota states that there are about 350.

Mr. LEVER. That information is available to the committee, but of course I can not carry all the figures in my mind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand, but the public at large does not see the report of the committee, and I am asking this information for the purpose of getting it into the RECORD.

Mr. LEVER. I shall be glad to put the figures into the RECORD.

Mr MOORE of Pennsylvania. How many of these 350 men are special experts, and how many are laborers?

Mr. LEVER. I will put the figures into the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will state the percentage that will be satisfactory.

Mr. LEVER. The larger number of these men engaged in cattle-tick work must be men of some little scientific information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This question has been asked before, but I ask it again, for the purposes of the RECORD: How are the salaries of the experts, scientists, and specialists employed in this work fixed? They are not fixed by law, as in other departments?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no. These salaries are paid out of the lump-sum appropriation of $631,560, and are fixed by the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry with the Secretary of Agriculture. The salaries range from $1,000 to $5,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask how these appointments are made; through the civil service or through the chief of the bureau?

Mr. LEVER. My impression is that all these scientific men are appointed through the civil service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. During the consideration of the bill last year the gentleman from South Carolina himself introduced an amendment, after some agitation of the subject, looking to the publication of the names or salaries of the various employees of the Department of Agriculture. Has such a list been prepared and presented to Congress?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken. There was an amendment which required the Secretary of Agriculture to include in his estimate a list of the employees of the department without naming them; that is, the various offices and the salaries attached to them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has that been done?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; it is in the estimates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the names of the various employees are not given?

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman says the resolution did not provide for it?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposed something of the kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did, and was defeated each time; but finally the gentleman from South Carolina, I think, did offer an amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman is mistaken in saying that I offered the amendment. I think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] made it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it came from the committee?

Mr. LEVER. It came from the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood that we would receive information as to the names and the salaries of the various special employees of the department.

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman will look at the estimates, he will find under every lump sum a list of the various employees, with the salary paid for the employment, and the number of men in each particular class.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated-butter factories and markets, $378,930.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 15, after the comma following the word "States," insert the words "eradication of tuberculosis in cattle."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that, and I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to again take very much time, although I shall ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1916 is just out. Therein is a statement that 10 per cent of the dairy cattle are affected with tuberculosis and 9 per cent of the hogs inspected during the past year were found to be so affected; that the cash loss caused thereby is $25,000,000 per annum. The bureau recommends pasteurization of skimmed milk, and so forth, as being effective.

The annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1916 shows that 252,686 cattle and hogs were condemned at the meat-inspection plants for all quarters, and that of this number 111,194 were condemned for tuberculosis. That is, 43.9 of the entire cattle and hogs that were condemned was by reason of tuberculosis.

Now, the question is, How long shall we continue without legislation to prevent this dreadful cause which results in the death of so many children of the country? I do not wish to make the statement that the milk production of this country has been responsible for infantile paralysis, but I do want to read what I have gathered from certain sources of authority.

In my extended remarks I propose to give exhibits of all the matters I have stated herein, and it will be a great pleasure to me to learn that the information given the Members of the House has caused them to look into the subject a little more deeply. It is well enough to talk about pasteurization, but why not go to the source of the evil to this great food supply of the human system without patching it up, without attempting to remove its injurious effect by pasteurization.

I want to refer to exhibit 14 in reference to the paralysis germ.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What evidence has the gentleman that the paralysis germs are in the milk?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is just what I am coming to.

On September 12, 1916, there was printed in the New York Herald a letter from Nathan Straus to Surg. Gen. Rupert Blue, in which Mr. Straus called attention to the fact that not one of the 2,500 babies fed on Straus pasteurized milk had contracted infantile paralysis, although the 2,500 babies were in the worst-infected district in New York. Mr. Straus called attention to the situation which is too startling to be a coincidence. It is also well known that the milk most generally sold in New York City is dipped milk. That is not bottled but open to all sorts of infection.

Mr. Straus's letter stirred great interest and some opposition. On October 16, 1916, the Washington Post, of this city, published a half column under the head "Finds Paralysis Germ," in which the statement is flatly made that the germ of infantile paralysis is carried in milk or water.

I read from the clipping handed me from the Washington Post of that date:

FINDS PARALYSIS GERM—BALTIMORE SCIENTIST SAYS IT IS INTRODUCED IN RAW FOODS—NO CONTAGION BY CONTACT—DREADED POLIOMYELITIS, OR INFANTILE PARALYSIS, GIVEN TO BABIES IN MILK AND WATER, TO OTHERS IN UNCOOKED FRUITS AND VEGETABLES—RABBIT WAS INFECTED.

BALTIMORE, October 15, 1916.

A rabbit used in the pathological department of Johns Hopkins Hospital to determine the method of transmission of the infantile paralysis germ has developed the disease, it was announced to-night.

Dr. Montrose T. Burrows, of the hospital, who discovered that the germ is taken into the system by the mouth, in milk and water, said that the experiment with the rabbit means another important advance toward solving the whole problem of poliomyelitis.

One of the legs of the rabbit has become paralyzed.

TRY IT ON MONKEYS.

Transmission will be next attempted through two monkeys.

The mystery surrounding the cause of the spread of infantile paralysis has been solved, according to an official of Johns Hopkins Hospital.

Extensive research conducted by Dr. Burrows, pathologist of the hospital, has resulted in the discovery of the infantile paralysis germ, the existence of which was established nine years ago by Dr. Simon Flexner, of the Rockefeller Institute.

PRESENT IN RAW FOODS.

Present always in every case of the disease a germ has been found in the big intestine, showing that the disease is spread by some raw food. That that food is milk or water is established by the fact that babies whose only diet has been milk or water died of the disease. Dr. Burrows and his assistants, under the direction of Prof. William H. Welch, have been making autopsies upon every victim of the disease since July. They have conducted a careful microscopic search.

Of the diseased organs it has been found that the germs occur only in the colon. The investigations prove that 100 per cent are infected in this big intestine. Since it is only possible for the germ to enter the big intestine by way of the mouth, food and drink must be the carrier.

RAISE QUARANTINE.

The investigators are so certain that this is true and that there is no other way for the disease to be contracted that they suggest that the quarantine be raised against personal contact and that all raw foods, such as milk, water, fruits, etc., be sterilized, boiled, or cooked before being given to children or others.

The investigators find that house flies and other insects undoubtedly help to spread the germ from one food to another. This discovery is the first one that has been given out officially by Johns Hopkins Hospital before it has been published in a recognized medical journal.

The spread of the disease is so much like that of typhoid fever and its method of communication that the investigators are sure they have hit upon a way to make an antipoliomyelitis vaccine like the anti-typhoid vaccine that stamped out typhoid in the United States Army.

The two incidents taken together point to milk as being the source of infection, for where pasteurized milk was given the Straus-fed babies the water failed to infect a single child.

I do not wish to be always taking up the time of the House pointing to this evil, but I tell you it is just as essential to see that we have pure milk and dairy products as it is to see that we have pure meats or any other food which forms an important part of the food products of our people.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the gentleman whether he believes that through milk is the only way in which the germ is carried?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Many scientists have practically decided that it is either carried by milk or by water, and the fact that most of this infantile paralysis was found to exist in children who consumed only milk and water made a very strong suspicion in that direction.

Mr. FOSTER. Would not pasteurization kill those germs?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; it would, but my contention is this: Why let a diseased product continue to exist when you can eradicate it at its source. It is better to do that than to wait to patch it up and cure it by pasteurization.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman realize that we are now carrying in this bill an appropriation of $75,000 for the purpose of conducting a campaign for the eradication of tuberculosis in cattle and hogs?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I certainly recognize that fact, and I recognize the further fact that the gentleman who is carrying on that inspection said at the hearings upon resolution 137 that it would not have the effect desired, because it was merely inspection, and they have no way to punish until it is finally discovered in the product.

Mr. FARR. Has the gentleman a method by which he thinks he can eliminate the trouble?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have not asked for any legislation upon the subject. I have merely asked that a resolution be passed and that a committee be appointed to investigate as to what legislation is necessary.

Mr. FARR. To eliminate tuberculosis in cattle?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes, in addition to the time already allotted for debate upon this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has evidently given a good deal of attention to this matter and is an expert upon the subject.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am not an expert.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to ask a question, whether the gentleman has any method or remedy to suggest for the eradication of tuberculosis? I think there is no question but that it should be eradicated.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I should adopt similar methods to that we have adopted in eradicating the foot-and-mouth disease, but it is not my desire to give any specific method myself, because I believe the Department of Agriculture knows more about the situation than I do. I should be willing to leave the legislation required and methods to them.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have eradicated the foot-and-mouth disease by the slaughter of the stock and paying for them. Does the gentleman suggest that that should be done in eradicating tuberculosis?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I make this statement, that the death of one child caused by tuberculosis is worth every dollar that Congress could appropriate to eradicate tuberculosis in cattle.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is not the question. Has the gentleman any remedy to suggest?

Mr. LINTHICUM. My remedy would be, if it is necessary, then, to destroy the cattle having tuberculosis and pay for them at such rate as determined, pasteurize all dairy products, compel tubercular test, have compulsory sanitation in handling, storing, and marketing in interstate business, and put the milk supply upon a sound basis.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman appreciates that $278,000 would not accomplish the desired result?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I know that under this we could only touch the high spots.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is aware of the fact that we have, in all, about 21,000,000 dairy cows, valued at about $1,185,119,000. Ten per cent of that is $118,511,900, and 7 per cent of the 39,453,000 other cattle, valued at $1,321,135,000 would be $39,000,000, which would require an appropriation of $210,000,000. Is the gentleman willing to appropriate $210,000,000 for the eradication of tuberculosis?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Would the gentleman from Iowa put $210,000,000 against the death of 6,000 infants in this country caused by tuberculous cattle? Is that what the gentleman means to say?

Mr. HAUGEN. I am willing to cooperate with the gentleman in the eradication of tuberculosis in cattle, but first we should have or decide upon some different and effective plan.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I mean to say this, that if it is necessary to spend $210,000,000 to eradicate tuberculosis in cattle to save the lives and suffering of 6,000 infants in the country and the maiming of thousands of others, then we should spend $210,000,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that $210,000,000 is a mere start, and $210,000,000 will not eradicate tuberculosis. The value of all farm animals is estimated to be over $6,000,000,000, and 10 per cent of that amount is over $600,000,000, therefore I believe we better leave it to the department to work out some plan how to exterminate tuberculosis.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think it would be necessary to destroy all of these cattle by any means.

Mr. HAUGEN. Not all of them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But we should segregate them, and we should pasteurize and look after the milk, and we should put it into other lines of business rather than have it go into the mouths of the children. I think we could devise some system by which a separation of the diseased cattle could be brought about by which the worst of them could be destroyed.

Mr. HAUGEN. I agree with the gentleman, but is it not better to leave it to the experts of the department and have them devise some plan in eradicating it rather than to have a committee appointed?

Mr. LINTHICUM. You want to leave it to the experts of the department, and the department says that effective legislation has not been passed. The department asks for a remedy and Congress refuses to pass legislation necessary.

Mr. HAUGEN. But we have carried out the suggestion made by the department and have confidence in its ability to cope with the situation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I read to you the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, page 6:

THE TUBERCULOSIS PROBLEM.

A practicable and effective method of eradicating tuberculosis of live stock is greatly to be desired. This is a problem to which the bureau has given much study. The protection of human health against tuberculosis from animal sources may be reasonably assured by the pasteurization of milk and the inspection of meats. But there remains the economic problem of eliminating the heavy and increasing losses due to the insidious spread of this disease among farm animals.

Cattle and hogs are the most susceptible species and the only ones that need to be considered. There is abundant evidence of the wide prevalence of tuberculosis among these animals. Statistics of tuberculin testing indicate that on an average over 10 per cent of the dairy cattle in the United States are affected with tuberculosis, and in the Federal meat inspection 2½ per cent of the beef cattle and 9 per cent of the hogs inspected during the past fiscal year were found to be so affected. The annual losses directly caused by this disease are estimated at $25,000,000. In the face of growing demands and higher prices for food products the Nation can not afford to ignore indefinitely such an enormous leakage in its meat and milk supplies.

The most practicable avenues of approach to the problem of tuberculosis eradication seems to be through the pure-bred herds of breeding cattle and the feeding of hogs. This means simply the application of the old principle of purifying the stream at its source. Many herds of fine pedigreed cattle have harbored tuberculosis, and many a stock raiser wishing to improve his stock has instead brought disaster to himself by the introduction of tuberculous pure-bred animals into his herd.

Hogs, because of the early age at which they are slaughtered, do not propagate the disease among their own kind to any appreciable extent, but acquire it from cattle either by drinking infected milk or by following cattle in the feed lot and feeding upon the undigested grain in the droppings. Raw skim milk returned from creameries to patrons and fed to pigs is a prolific source of the disease in swine. The milk from many herds is mixed at the creamery, and if even one lot has the germs of tuberculosis in it the entire quantity may become infected. The remedy for this is simple—merely to pasteurize all the skim milk before allowing it to leave the creamery. This should be required by law.

The elimination of tuberculosis from the pure-bred herds should be accomplished gradually by utilizing the tuberculin test in conjunction with other appropriate measures. In any event the cooperation of the Federal and State Governments and individual breeders will be necessary. One of the first steps should be to spread among the people concerned a knowledge of the facts as to the nature of tuberculosis, how it is spread, and how it may be prevented.

Mr. FARR. What is the department doing in a practical way to eradicate the disease other than by destroying the cattle?

Mr. LINTHICUM. They are not destroying the cattle. They are inspecting, and when they can find that product in some dairy or butter factory is diseased, then they condemn it. But there is no general inspection of milk products.

Mr. FARR. There is no effort being made to eradicate it in any other way?

Mr. LINTHICUM. They are endeavoring——

Mr. FARR. To seek the specific cause?

Mr. LINTHICUM. To clean up things generally under such legislation they have, but they need proper legislation to bring about desired results.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman is willing, to have one minute, not to be taken out of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent to have one minute in addition to the time already allotted. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. I will not object to that request, but I will object to any further extension of the time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I am fully in sympathy with the gentleman from Maryland in seeking to stamp out tuberculosis among cattle, but I want to read for his information the hearings on page 98, in which Dr. Melvin says:

Our department undertook the eradication of tuberculosis in the District. Of course, there were a very small number of cattle in the District—about 1,000 head—probably less than that now; and we succeeded in doing that. In the neighboring herds of Maryland and Virginia, supplying milk to the District, we undertook to cooperate with the local health service, and we succeeded in reducing the disease in such herds from about 18 per cent down to, I think, about 2 per cent.

Now, I want to say this, that I do not know what the State of Maryland is doing, and I wanted to ask the gentleman. But I know in some States they are making very active efforts to stamp out tuberculosis; doing all they can. The transporting of milk or butter or other products of the dairy is in interstate commerce and can only be reached by the Federal Government in that way. And so this duty devolves largely upon laws that are enacted by the different States to stamp out the disease. I know some States have most excellent laws and are doing a great work along this line, but without the cooperation of the States the Federal Government can not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized.

[Mr. SLOAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. Does the gentleman from South Carolina insist on his point of order?

Mr. LEVER. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not see, Mr. Chairman, why that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the ground that this amendment is not germane to this paragraph, the works of tuberculosis eradication being carried in a previous paragraph and already passed.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph says:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industries in the various States, inspection of renovated butter factories and markets.

Now, certainly those are very broad terms, and the further addition of the "eradication of tuberculosis" ought not to be subject to a point of order. I do not see why the gentleman wants to make a point of order upon the flimsy ground that the subject is carried in the previous paragraph. Why should that be used as the reason?

Mr. LEVER. I put it on the "flimsy" ground that we do not want to clutter up the bill by repetitions that do not mean anything.

Mr. LINTHICUM. As to each paragraph where I might put the amendment the gentleman from South Carolina or some one else says it is not the right paragraph and that it ought not to be in that place.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield to the gentleman; certainly.

Mr. MANN. Under the amendment suggested by the gentleman, providing for the eradication of tuberculosis, does that authorize the purchase or payment for cattle which are killed?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know that it would authorize the payment for cattle which are killed, but it would certainly authorize the segregation of the cattle and separate them and eradicate them by a general system that could be adopted, which would not be very expensive to the Government.

Mr. MANN. Would it not authorize that term "eradication of tuberculosis"?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It may be the same with reference to cattle ticks and other things of that kind.

Mr. MANN. It does authorize the killing of cattle ticks, and it makes an appropriation for it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think it is germane to the subject

Mr. STAFFORD. The Chair will notice that the paragraph under consideration is limited exclusively to matters pertaining to the dairy industry. Under that present phraseology the Secretary of Agriculture would have no right to go out and investigate conditions, so far as cattle are concerned. It is the industry. It is limited to that. Even cooperative industry is limited to the dairy industry and markets. The idea is that the paragraph is limited to the industry itself and not to cattle generally.

Mr. LEVER. Investigations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi). The Chair is of the opinion that under this paragraph the amendment is not germane. It is carried in a previous paragraph, contained on page 12, that treats of the subjects this amendment deals with. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in animal husbandry; for experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with the State agricultural experiment stations, including repairs and additions to and erection of buildings absolutely necessary to carry on the experiments, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other necessary expenses, $250,300: Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated $22,840 may be used for experiments in the breeding and maintenance of horses for military purposes: Provided further, That of the sum thus appropriated $45,380 may be used for experiments in poultry feeding and breeding, including the feeding and breeding of ostriches and investigations and experiments in the study of the ostrich industry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If I have been correctly advised, this item includes an allotment of $25,000 for farm sheep demonstrations in cooperation with the States Relations Service and the agricultural colleges.

Mr. LEVER. There is a total increase, I will say to the gentleman, in this item of $53,800. Twenty-five thousand dollars of that will be devoted to the matter of sheep farm demonstration in connection with the States Relations Service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What assurance have we that that $25,000 will be expended for this purpose?

Mr. LEVER. We have the assurance of the Department of Agriculture itself, which asked for a $25,000 increase of this item for that purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state why it is not specifically referred to in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. It is for the reason that the committee does not feel that it ought to segregate all these various small items, because it makes the bill too cumbersome and too hard to handle.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few observations with respect to this paragraph. During the discussion last year, and I think previously, an effort was made to have consideration given to what we might call sheep culture in the United States, the development of the sheep industry, which has suffered sadly through the rapacity of the dogs of the country.

There is a demand for wool, a high price for wool, and the fabricators of wool in the various grades, to whom reference was made here this morning, are anxious for an opportunity to work upon this raw product of the farmer. So far as the wool as produced by the farmer is concerned, it would be simply wool and of advantage to him only in the form of sheep rugs or such crude articles as the handicraft of his own family might weave. If it goes into the mills and factories of the country where it would have to go through various processes, from the washing and scouring up to the weaving and dyeing of it, that would require new capital and labor.

This in a way answers such questions as were raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin and the first gentleman from Nebraska who spoke a while ago, rather exalting the farmer at the expense of the city man. I contend that the farmer would be left high and dry under his own vine and fig tree, in the wilderness in which he started, if it were not for the expenditure of effort on the part of others to make his products worth while. He would have his own products for himself, to be sure.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. LEVER. I wonder if the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not know that every true friend of agriculture recognizes the relationship that must exist between the man on the farm and the man in the city, and that we are the best friends in the world, as a matter of fact?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very glad the gentleman makes that statement, and coming from the head of this powerful committee and from one of the most popular farmers' friends in the House, I am mighty glad to make acknowledgment of it. It tends to contradict the impression I have been trying to discredit here, that there was any difference whatever between the farmer on the one hand and the city man on the other. Their interests are identical, and one is dependent on the other, no matter how we may view their various economic situations.

The gentleman having made this interesting admission——

Mr. LEVER. It is not an admission. It is the statement of a recognized fact.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has a keen national apprehension of this matter, and while he will take care of the southern cattle tick and the interests of South Carolina also, at times I am glad to observe that he is broad enough to encompass the whole country in his purviews. That is what I like to see on the part of any real representative of the American people. [Laughter.] But what I am not able to understand is why we do not put in this Agricultural bill the same specific provisions with regard to appropriations and salaries that we require in every other appropriation bill. Here is a lump-sum appropriation of $250,300, which is to cover certain lines of work to be laid down by the Secretary of Agriculture. We have no check upon the wages to be paid nor the allotments to be made in this particular instance except as it appears in the committee report. While I am interested in this $25,000 sheep item for the benefit of the farmer and of the city man alike, neither having any preference over the other in this regard, I have no assurance that this $25,000 will be expended except as it appears in the report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri). The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.

Mr. LEVER. Then I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to discuss this further. I withdraw my request for further time on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina now withdraw his motion?

Mr. LEVER. I withdraw my motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and the necessary alterations of buildings thereon, and the necessary expenses for investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products, $134,600: Provided, That of said sum $50,000 may be used for researches concerning the cause, modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention of the disease of contagious abortion of animals.

Mr. LINTHICUM Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LINTHICUM: Page 14, line 8, after the word "animals," insert the words "eradication of tuberculosis in cattle."

Mr. LEVER. I make a point of order against that amendment, that it is not germane to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, this is the paragraph which deals with investigation of diseases of animals—

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals.

This is certainly one of the diseases of animals. I do not see why it is not germane.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman recognize the difference between investigation of a disease and eradication of a disease?

Mr. LINTHICUM. What is the gentleman's difference? I am after results.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman can conceive the difference.

Mr. FARR. I suggest to the gentleman that he change the phraseology of his amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask unanimous consent to change the amendment so as to read "investigation of tuberculosis in cattle."

Mr. KELLEY. This paragraph says:

Investigations in diseases of animals.

Why specialize? Is not the general language enough?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Because I want in particular to get an investigation of this subject.

Mr. QUIN. The paragraph itself says:

For investigations of tuberculin.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 18, after the word "animals," insert the words "investigation of tuberculosis in cattle."

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on that paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no desire to debate the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the disease of hog cholera, and for its control or eradication by such means as may be necessary, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and other methods, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State or county authorities, $413,100: Provided, That of said sum $172,240 shall be available for expenditures in carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913, regulating the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, or shipment of any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product manufactured in the United States and the importation of such products intended for use in the treatment of domestic animals: And provided further, That of said sum $32,060 shall be available for researches concerning the cause, modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention of this disease.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The hog-cholera item this year is $413,100, a very large sum of money to be appropriated for a specific purpose. I suppose if that amount of money were to be applied in the public-building bill to the erection of 15 or 20 permanent structures, to stand throughout the balance of our years, there would be some criticism of it in the House. It is possible that the chairman of the committee may be willing to explain the need for this $413,100 for this specific purpose for the coming year.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, this item has been increased for the next fiscal year $60,000, but as a matter of fact the additional amount that will be available for the next fiscal year as over the present fiscal year will be only $15,000, inasmuch as there has been an unexpended balance out of another appropriation with which they have been working during this present fiscal year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the reason why this large sum should be appropriated for the purpose of controlling hog cholera in this country, that question ought to answer itself. It is estimated by experts who ought to know that the annual losses from hog cholera in this country amount to anywhere from $40,000,000 to $60,000,000. That is a burden upon the constituents of the gentleman in Philadelphia. It is estimated that there is an annual loss in cattle on account of the cattle tick or Texas fever of something like $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, which, of course, is a burden upon the constituents of the gentleman who eat the beef. It is estimated that there is an annual loss of $25,000,000 in this country on account of tuberculosis in cattle and hogs, which, of course, adds to the price of beef and pork, which the constituents of the gentleman have to buy. So I repeat, after all, there is no quarrel between the constituents of the gentleman in Philadelphia and the constituents of myself in South Carolina, because his interest is my interest and his folks can not eat unless my folks produce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is entirely correct. The gentleman is as intelligent and as fair in this statement as he was in his former statement, and I make public acknowledgment of that fact. Now, may I ask the gentleman a serious question?

Mr. LEVER. I have been making a serious statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we make this appropriation of $413,100, which comes out of the Public Treasury to which we all contribute, can we get pure "pork" in the great cities?

Mr. LEVER. The matter of pure pork in the great cities is carried in the item for meat inspection, and not here. What we are doing here is to get more pork, not pure pork. We take care of the pure pork elsewhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will be quite as serious, and will refrain from seeing the jocular side of this question when the public-building bill comes up. But, again,

I want to know whether the disease of hog cholera has been brought within narrower limits by reason of the appropriations made last year?

Mr. LEVER. The reports of those in charge of this work are very favorable to an encouraging reduction in hog cholera in this country. It is a very serious problem, as the gentleman quite well understands.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know it is.

Mr. LEVER. And it is going to be very hard, indeed, to control, if we ever control it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there a necessity, in the opinion of the committee, for maintaining the large establishment that we now have to maintain for this purpose?

Mr. LEVER. The committee emphatically think that a disease which is costing the people of this country, farmer and consumer, $60,000,000 a year is a problem big enough for serious consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not objecting to the item. I am asking for information.

Mr. LEVER. I assume that the gentleman is not objecting to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I suggest to the House, as something to be remembered when other bills come up, that Members are inclined to be reasonable about all these agricultural bills, and that there is a great deal of criticism against certain other appropriation bills.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield, so that I may ask him a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not a fact that there has been a very large reduction in the amount of hog cholera in this country, running to about 30 per cent, and has not the largest decrease in hog cholera been in and about the centers of Government activity in the campaign against hog cholera?

Mr. LEVER. That is my information; and in this connection I want to pay my tribute to the industry of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] in helping to initiate this legislation.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. To what extent are the several States contributing to the eradication of these diseases?

Mr. LEVER. Several States are contributing an equal amount of money.

Mr. GOOD. Where the Government spends $1,000 in a State to eradicate one of these diseases the State contributes another $1,000?

Mr. LEVER. Not necessarily. Perhaps I misled the gentleman in what I said. Under the agricultural extension act a number of counties have what is known as a county agent.

Under that act the State is required to put up part of the salaries and the Government the other half, the States in many instances paying much more than the Government. In hog-cholera work the hog-cholera eradicator is paid by the department and he works in close cooperation with the county agent, so that the States indirectly are contributing something to this work.

[The time of Mr. LEVER having expired he was by unanimous consent given two minutes more.]

Mr. GOOD. In many cases the Government pays out considerable sums of money for the eradication of, say, hog cholera?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Is there any cooperation so far as the State is concerned where the State contributes any large sum?

Mr. LEVER. I am not sure whether they make any direct contribution or not. I may have that information, but I can not put my hand on it. I was in Kansas last fall and happened to come in contact with one of these hog-cholera eradicators who had been in a county two years, and he showed me a map of the county when he was first called with dots here and there where they had the hog-cholera infection. It was literally black with spots. Then he showed it to me as it was about 18 months afterwards, and I think there were only two infections in that great county. I was very much encouraged with the progress of that work as I saw it in Kansas in the field.

Mr. GOOD. Was the gentleman in Kansas at the request of the department?

Mr. LEVER. No; I was there in the interest of the people of the United States; I was there to convert a lot of Republicans. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for the investigation, treatment, and eradication of dourine, $99,000, of which amount $50,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. FOSTER and Mr. STAFFORD reserved points of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina what is the necessity of making $50,000 immediately available?

Mr. LEVER. The reason for making $50,000 immediately available was because of the urgent request of the gentlemen who are in charge of the eradication of dourine. They desire this money when the spring round-up begins, when the horses from the round-up begin to scatter throughout the country. They find after some years of study that if they have the money in the springtime, they can use it to much better advantage and they urge that this amount be immediately available because they find that it can be more efficiently spent at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the present appropriation act there is $75,000 available for the prosecution of this work. An additional $50,000 would make it $125,000. Deducting that from the $99,000 it would only leave $49,000 for the next fiscal year. So you will appropriate $125,000 for the present fiscal year and only $49,000 for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is correct about that, but the committee acted upon the request of the department and gives an appropriation of $99,000, making $50,000 immediately available upon the theory that they could do a larger amount of work than if they used the whole $99,000 the next fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the expectation that the experts will be able to stamp out the disease so that they will only need $49,000 for the ensuing year?

Mr. LEVER. The statement as to the ultimate eradication of the disease is not entirely encouraging to me. The disease has spread into half a dozen Western States. The gentleman can recognize the tremendous difficulty in stamping out a disease of that kind in range horses. They make the statement in the hearings that with such appropriation as they request from time to time in line of this appropriation that they can probably stamp it out in the course of two years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that $25,000 would be sufficient to be made available for the present fiscal year?

Mr. LEVER. I am frank to say to the gentleman that in a matter of this kind, where the disease is so highly infectious and where the losses can be so tremendously great, that I would not want to put my lay judgment against the judgment of the experts.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can appreciate that with $50,000 available immediately there will not be ample funds for the next fiscal year.

Mr. LEVER. We think the $50,000 can be better used now than in the next fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation of diseases of cotton, potatoes, truck crops, forage crops, drug and related plants, $82,800, of which sum $5,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 19, line 19, strike out $82,800 and insert $87,800.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment calls for an increase of $5,000 in the appropriation, to be used by the Bureau of Plant Industry for studying diseases of beans and finding and applying a remedy. The bean diseases have increased in number as the ravages have increased rapidly in this country, the department making the startling statement that the losses run from 10 to 20 per cent of the crop. That statement appears in the Book of Estimates and was made by one of the officials who appeared before the committee. He now makes the startling statement, as the result of later investigation, that in many cases the loss runs as high as 50 per cent of the entire crop.

I learned, by talking with an official of the department, that it is the intention to employ one man to conduct investigations in the States of New York and Michigan, where a large part of the beans of the country are produced; that is, one man to do or try to do the work necessary in both of those States. That is, all the money that is now provided, which will be carried by the appropriation as it appears in the bill, will permit the employment of only one man to cover both States. I asked this official what would be done if this appropriation were increased $5,000, and he said it would permit the employment of this man to oversee the work in two States and would permit the employment of two more men, one in each of these States, and I submit that it must seem clear to this committee that the employment of one man in each State will not be an extravagant use of money. The amendment which I request ought to be made so as to provide for that employment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does this relate especially to the culture, and so forth, of what they call the navy bean?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. To the different kinds of beans, the navy bean and the Lima bean and other varieties. They are all subject to one or another of the several diseases. There are more than one, and they have been very bad during recent years, and it is some time since the department has made any considerable investigation. As appears by the statement made by the Bureau of Plant Industry, when the estimates were submitted, it was stated that the losses have been running from 10 to 20 per cent of the entire production, whereas later investigation, as appear by the letter dated January 2 received by me from the department, indicates that the losses this year in some cases reach as high as 50 per cent of the crop.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Does the department, in the letter to which the gentleman has just referred, recommend this $5,000 additional?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It makes no recommendation, but it clearly indicates the need of the increased money. As I say, the chief told me that the amount in the bill will allow for only one man to be employed for the two States, New York and Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. And the chief of the bureau says it would be desirable to employ a man in each of the States, and to have the one man he proposes to employ oversee the entire work. The additional $5,000 I ask will provide for the employment of additional men, one in each State, one in Michigan and one in New York.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has there not already been a considerable increase in the appropriation over what has been heretofore carried? As I have it, there has been an increase of some $23,000 in this particular appropriation.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes; there is a total increase in this item of $24,000, and the estimates indicate how that increase is to be used. Only $5,000 is to be expended in this bean-disease matter, and that $5,000 will employ only one man for the two States, not a large enough increase.

Figures gathered by the Department of Agriculture are interesting and instructive in this connection. In 1915 the acreage of beans in this country was 928,000, the total production was 10,321,000 bushels, an average of 11.1 bushels per acre. In 1916 the acreage was larger, 945,000, but the yield, 8,846,000, was smaller than in 1915, the average yield in 1916 being only 9.4 bushels per acre. The total value of 1916 crop was $44,763,000, while in 1915 the total value was only $26,771,000, the reason for the greater value in 1916 being that the average price per bushel in that year was $5.06, while in 1915 it was only $2.59. In 1916 the acreage was 17,000 larger than in 1915, but owing to the increase of bean diseases in 1916 the production was 1,475,000 less than in 1915, and the average per acre was 1.7 bushels less in 1916 than in 1915.

It is clearly shown that bean diseases are increasing and spreading. The department has given little attention to them. It is incumbent upon the Congress to direct that the work of investigating and finding remedies for the trouble be begun without further delay and carried on vigorously. The additional money to be provided by my amendment will be needed for the work. I trust that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to oppose an amendment offered by a member of the committee, but I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have increased the appropriation in this item $25,000, with a view that $5,000 of that sum is to be used in investigating the various bean diseases and to promote the propagation and distribution of disease-free seed. Last year we appropriated $5,000 for this work, and now we are appropriating in this bill $5,000 additional. The gentleman's amendment proposes to increase it further by $5,000, and as I get his explanation, it is with a view of providing one man to supervise the investigational work of some two or three other men. My own view of such situations is that he can very well afford not to make large increases in the investigational work of the department, giving them increases, however, when we think they need to have additional men, but the investigational work of the department is always slow and must take time. If this were a case of going out and demonstrating something that had been found to be a remedy, I would make no objection to it at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Considering the very great importance of the bean industry in reference to the cost of living, considering the fact that we of the North are very fond of beans to eat, and that we have increased the appropriation for the citrus canker, which just precedes this, by several hundred thousand dollars, does not the gentleman think that we can well afford to take care of the beans to the extent of $5,000 additional?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman understands that we have already in this item given the department's estimates on the proposition of beans, and the gentleman knows, of course, that as chairman of the committee I am compelled to find a line of consistency somewhere.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is true; yes. The State of Michigan, I believe, though I am not sure, is the principal producer of beans. They grow well in the sandy soil of that State. There is nothing more important than to have a large supply of beans when it comes to keeping down the high cost of living. The diseases have struck those beans over there, and the whole business is in a precarious situation, according to my information. People will not raise beans in competition with other things unless they are sure of a reasonable profit.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the seriousness of the situation, and I therefore was willing to give the increase estimated for by the department. I do not care to discuss the matter at length. I am willing to leave it to the House to do as it pleases with the matter. I do not believe if it increases it that I shall shed any tears, and I do not believe the gentleman from Michigan will shed any tears if the House does not agree to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the physiology of crop plants and for testing and breeding varieties thereof, $49,060.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling attention to some facts in reference to cotton which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

These "Facts about cotton" were prepared by 100 of the leading cotton factors, banks, merchants, and business men of the South and published in the Commercial Appeal in Memphis, Tenn., on January 2, 1917. The figures upon which these facts are based were those obtainable up to December 15, 1916. The publisher of the Commercial Appeal states in an editorial note that he guarantees that the parties who prepared and published "Facts about cotton" are legitimate, high-grade business concerns and that he personally investigated before allowing the publication to appear in that paper. These facts, as stated in the article, I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Following is the article referred to:

FACTS ABOUT COTTON.

The last three weeks has seen a serious decline in the price of cotton and the consequent loss of millions of dollars to the South. As there is considerable misunderstanding and as the situation is apt to be still confusing, the following facts are placed before you for careful consideration:

CROP SHORTAGE.

It is generally admitted that the crop this year (1916) is very short. The Government estimate on December 8 was 11,511,000 bales. The last two years, considering acreage, have practically been crop failures. It does not seem that next season can show much relief, as fertilizer is still inferior in quality and high in price and the boll weevil will probably operate more extensively than ever.

In the past six years we have produced two 14,000,000-bale crops, one 15,000,000-bale crop, and one in excess of 16,000,000 bales. But to-day we have not enough cotton in sight to supply the present indicated demand. The season started with an American visible supply of 2,235,000 bales. The indicated crop, linters included, is 12,500,000, a total of 14,735,000 bales. Last year's consumption was 14,800,000, and as it is, of course, impossible to reduce the actual cotton not used up to less than a million bales or even a million and a half bales, a vast shortage is apparent.

The average consumption of the past six years has been 14,042,000. The American mills are running ahead of last year. More spindles are in operation to-day and exports are in excess of last season by 729,713 bales (up to Dec. 15).

CONSUMPTION.

In 1914 and 1915 the world consumed 24,581,000 bales of cotton, of which the United States produced 16,071,000 bales. The consumption in 1915 and 1916 was 21,011,000 bales. The consumption this year will, of course, be problematical, but on the whole the United States can add to the supply only to the extent of its probable current yield of 12,500,000 bales (which includes linters).

Cotton in quantity is produced in British India, Egypt, Russia, Turkey, Persia, colonial Africa, and Mexico, all of which countries are now at war.

Collectively the above countries produced in 1914 and 1915, 7,000,000 bales of cotton, and because of conditions no such like yield can be expected to-day. It has been said that the consumption of cotton generally will fall off because we can not ship to the central powers. This is true, and yet there is another important fact to be considered—the markets supplied by the central powers must be supplied from somewhere else. South America, colonial Africa, and other countries buying formerly from the central powers must now buy from England, America, and Japan, and trade reports of to-day show that they are doing this. There is a large firm of Japanese buyers in Austin, Tex., and not long since they stated that fully a million bales would be shipped to Japan this year (1916). There has been an increase of 500,000 spindles in Japan since last year—total there now of 3,500,000 spindles.

Again, the net consumption of the central powers admits of easy exaggeration, as they possess only one-tenth of the world's spindles, and their elimination has simply transferred the burden of manufacture of the finished product to our country in the main, and to others, as Japan, in a lesser degree. It is further estimated that 1,000,000 bales will be used for war purposes, such as the manufacture of munitions and high explosives. This would offset in a large way the forced stoppage of demand from the central powers.

EARLY MOVEMENT OF 1916 CROP.

The movement of the 1916 crop has been rapid. More than 95 per cent of it has been ginned; 8,100,772 bales up to December 15 has been brought into sight, an increase over the same period of last year of 1,415,609 bales. The exports to the same date were 2,795,026 bales, an increase of 729,091 bales. The takings by northern spindles were 1,407,261 bales, an increase of 150,442 bales; by southern spinners 2,008,295 bales, an increase of 421,486 bales. Over one-half the 1916 crop (on Government estimate) has reached its ultimate destination.

UNUSUAL DEMAND.

This fall and winter has been one of extraordinary prosperity for the United States and its 100,000,000 people. Never before has the country been so prosperous. It has been a remarkably fine trading season. Few dry-goods stores have large stocks after the great business they have done in the last few weeks. They will soon have to replenish. When prices are high merchants do not overload; they couldn't overload for the chief reason that deliveries could not be made by oversold jobbers and mills. Dry-goods stores have been buying from hand to mouth, either because deliveries could not be made or hoping that goods would be cheaper, but such has not been the case, and the demand for cotton goods next spring is bound to be enormous.

CONTRIBUTING REASONS.

One reason why cotton has been high, of course, has been natural increase of values of all commodities. It is not necessary to go into the causes of this increase, such as a surplus gold supply, huge paper war credits, etc. The fast shrinking purchasing power of the dollar is due to some extent to these causes, consequently all things are high. Some commodities have risen 300 per cent in value, but on a long list of commodities an appreciation of about 50 per cent above normal exists. Now the price for the past six years has averaged over 12 cents per pound, so that this average increase alone as applied to cotton would seem to warrant at this time not less than 18 cents per pound, basis middling.

FUTURE.

The world is at present consuming more than the world at present is able to produce. There is more demand for iron and steel than all the iron and steel plants in existence can turn out. There is more demand for foodstuffs than the farmers of this and other countries are able at present to supply. There is more demand for cotton than the South this year grew. Between 30,000,000 and 40,000,000 men in Europe have been taken away from production and made consumers of foodstuffs and clothing. Conditions under which they live and waste connected with feeding and clothing an army probably doubles the ordinary peace requirements for the same men. It might be said that there has been a sudden added demand for food and clothing for 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 people. This means that aside from the cheapness of the dollar and the shortness of certain grain crops and the scarcity of other materials foodstuffs and clothing materials generally would be higher in price. Should peace come, other commodities might fall in price. But it would seem that cotton is not so apt to, for the reason that should peace be declared all the spindles of the world would become active, of which there are 148,500,000. The markets would be freer and even with a bumper crop cotton would still be in great demand. With the declaration of peace it is estimated that Germany and Austria alone would require 3,000,000 bales of cotton. This being so, cotton should sell at much higher prices.

YOU CAN BORROW MONEY ON YOUR COTTON.

It is easy for you to arrange to hold your cotton if you do not wish to sell at present prices. Your local bank will loan up to 90 per cent of the market value. There should be no difficulty about this, for money is easy, and it is an easy matter for the local bank to get the notes rediscounted by the Federal reserve bank. All those who want to hold their cotton should have no difficulty in arranging to do so.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to get some information from the chairman of the committee. I notice in the citrus canker paragraph that there is cooperation by the States to a very large amount, and I rose to ask how general that plan of investigation is, where the General Government should be met by the cooperation of the State in the same line of investigation?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that since the passage of the agricultural extension bill some three years ago, at least with the Department of Agriculture, there is an increasing desire to have State cooperation on these other propositions, especially these propositions which require the employment of a large field force—the character of work that might be described as demonstration, as contradistinguished from investigation—and the Committee on Agriculture is in line with the thought of the Agricultural Department in requiring some degree of cooperation on the part of the States in lines of work of that character.

Mr. FESS. May I ask whether there are many lines in addition to the citrus-canker feature?

Mr. LEVER. Well, the foot-and-mouth disease is based on the same line of thought. The demonstration work in the North and in the South requires the same cooperative work. The gentleman will recall that the Federal road act is predicated upon the same idea.

Mr. FESS. Hog cholera?

Mr. LEVER. Hog cholera to a degree, and cattle tick to a degree. The States are providing more money for the eradication of cattle tick than the Federal Government itself.

Mr. FESS. The boll weevil?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman refers to the demonstration work done to meet the ravages of the boll weevil, yes. The States affected actually contribute more money to the work than is appropriated by the Federal Government.

Mr. FESS. I understand that the committee favors that sort of work—the cooperative method?

Mr. LEVER. I think I can speak for the entire committee on that. I am certain the chairman of the committee does favor doing it as far as possible. Of course, each line of work must necessarily depend upon itself as to whether or not it may be carried on best by cooperative arrangement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. With pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to look at line 18, page 19, for the investigation of diseases of cotton, potatoes, and so forth, for the purpose of ascertaining if he knows what progress is being made with respect to the wart or scab on the potato in Maine.

Mr. LEVER. We had no testimony before the committee this year on that proposition, but the testimony before the committee last year was that the scab difficulty in Maine had been cleaned up. The quarantine has been lifted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it true that the embargo against the Canadian potato has been lifted?

Mr. LEVER. I so understand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will that mean that there will be a decrease in the appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. LEVER. Practically none of this money will be used for that. We carried that in a separate item.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Several years ago?

Mr. LEVER. We carried a separate item two years ago of something like $50,000, as I recollect it, for the scab work in Maine. Last year we dropped that item because the work had been completed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the department satisfied, so far as the gentleman knows, that the danger of invasion from the Canadian scab is removed?

Mr. LEVER. I would judge so from the fact that they have raised the quarantine.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For soil-bacteriology and plant-nutrition investigations, including the testing of samples, procured in the open market, of cultures for inoculating legumes, and if any such samples are found to be impure, nonviable, or misbranded, the results of the tests may be published, together with the names of the manufacturers and of the persons by whom the cultures were offered for sale, $39,300.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. As to the samples of culture with which they inoculate the legumes, have they become a successful commercial product?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, yes; so far as I have information. I know there are a number of large firms engaged in the manufacturing of cultures for the leguminous plants.

Mr. REAVIS. That is largely for alfalfa, is it?

Mr. LEVER. It is for alfalfa, beans, peas, clover, and other leguminous plants.

Mr. REAVIS. I was asking whether or not bacteria had to be furnished for clover?

Mr. LEVER. If it is not already in the soil.

Mr. REAVIS. I knew it did for alfalfa, but I presumed if the soil was not acid clover would grow on any soil.

Mr. LEVER. You take the soil in my own State, for instance, and if you sow clover on that soil it will come up, a beautiful stand, and apparently grow up very nicely, but in the course of a few weeks it will die down as if a fire had gone over it if you do not inoculate the soil with this bacteria.

Mr. REAVIS. Well, I had always understood that the destruction of the clover plant, after securing a stand of that kind, was chargeable largely to the lack of limestone in the soil, or the lack of some other mineral element that destroyed the acidity of the soil.

Mr. LEVER. Well, any farmer sowing clover would always sprinkle his land strongly with lime, but that will not give you these little bugs that are necessary for the growth of the clover.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Clover will not grow successfully in my section of the country without the bacteria, and hence they are furnished in small quantities to the people in order that they may secure the benefits of their use.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under subhumid, semiarid, or dry-land conditions, $160,000: Provided, That the limitation in this act as to the cost of farm buildings shall not apply to this paragraph: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the free distribution, or propagation for free distribution, of cuttings, seedlings, or trees of willow, box elder, ash, caragana, or other common varieties of fruit, ornamental, or shelter-belt trees in the northern Great Plains area, except for experimental or demonstration purposes in the States of North and South Dakota west of the one hundredth meridian, and in Montana and Wyoming east of the 5,000-foot contour line.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This item appropriates $160,000 for the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under semihumid, semiarid, and dry-land conditions. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee in what particular States these conditions prevail?

Mr. LEVER. They prevail in all States which have the conditions described in the language of this item.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No part of this appropriation would be expended in the State of Delaware, for instance?

Mr. LEVER. No; because that State could not be described either as semihumid, semiarid, or a dry-land State.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do the States that would benefit from this appropriation participate at all in the expense of this improvement or reclamation work? I assume that some of this money would be expended in the State of Arizona or the State of Nevada?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do either of those States contribute to this sort of reclamation work?

Mr. LEVER. I can not tell the gentleman offhand whether they do through a direct appropriation or not, but I am inclined to think they do not. But I can say this to the gentleman: That the experiment stations and the agricultural colleges of these various States do take a very lively cooperative interest in this line of work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They do, with the Government money?

Mr. LEVER. Yes. There is the closest cooperation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands the other day—the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]—said that he would not support any proposition for the intercoastal canals, and his statement resulted in some comment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on that subject. I observe that gentlemen, like the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, do not fail to be provided for in some way or other for their particular State projects in some bill, though they strenuously avoid the river and harbor bill. They are able to get in somewhere and to obtain some help from the Government if it does not appear to be what some of the great editors now regard as "pork."

I wish the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were here for a minute or two—he was here earlier in the morning—in order that he might comment upon appropriations of this kind, because in a little while the bill that he will bring in, providing an appropriation of $5,000, more or less, for the erection of a post office somewhere, will be severely criticized. Views of some of the great editors of the country, whose individual opinions have the weight of gospel, will be echoed and reechoed upon this floor doubtless by some of our great national economists. The expenditures contemplated will be denounced as "pork," whatever that is. Now, I sound this note in advance because we passed a little "pork" item of over $400,000 a short while ago about which little or nothing was said. The chairman of the committee assured us that it was intended to guarantee "pure pork."

Mr. LEVER. I did not guarantee pure pork; but I said the item was intended to promote the purity of pork. That was in another item.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman did seem to think it was the wrong kind of pork, because it was tacked onto an agricultural appropriation bill. According to public opinion, criticism of such items applies only to river and harbor bills or to items in a public-building bill.

Now, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is an eloquent Member of the House and has very strong opinions on the question of arid lands and the giving away of vast acreages to the people of the West. He said, however, that he would not vote for an appropriation to construct a canal that tended to improve communication, bring the States together, develop industry, and promote trade; but he is not here objecting to the appropriation of $160,000 that people may go out and look over a lot of semihumid, semiarid, and dry land. Oh, yes; I see the gentleman is here. I beg his pardon. He is here and listening to what I say. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations in connection with western irrigation agriculture, the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act, and other areas in the arid and semiarid regions, $75,380.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to occupy just two minutes. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania through?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was through; but now I may not be. [Laughter.] I may want a minute in reply.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph be concluded in three minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, we have been making agreements like that all the morning, and gentlemen have repeatedly asked to have the time extended. I shall have to object.

Mr. LEVER. Then I withdraw my request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FERRIS. I will not take advantage of the opportunity to speak.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I withdraw my request also.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from South Carolina is withdrawn.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question relative to the beet-seed item that we have just passed over. I want some information. Does the gentleman in charge of the bill think we shall ever be able to produce in this country the beet seed necessary to plant the American crop?

Mr. LEVER. The statements made this year or last year before the committee—I am not sure which—led the committee to think and believe that there was no reason why we should not be able to produce an ample supply of beet seed in this country.

Mr. FESS. About what proportion do we now produce?

Mr. LEVER. A very small proportion. We have suffered a great deal recently because of that fact.

Mr. FESS. But the opinion of the chairman is that we will eventually reach the stage where we will produce the seed we need?

Mr. LEVER. I see no reason why, with proper encouragement, we shall not produce all the seed we need.

Mr. FESS. I recall the statement of a former Secretary of Agriculture to the effect that there were about 278,000,000 acres of ground adapted to growing beets in this country, and naturally the beet-seed item would be an important one if such a supply could be secured.

Mr. LEVER. We provided an appropriation in the bill last year for that. It is in the current law.

Mr. MURRAY. I want to suggest that the chairman of the committee was not quite certain about the number of seeds, but that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] is an authority on free seeds. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. I will say further to the gentleman from Ohio that Dr. Taylor in his statement before the committee said:

Anticipating somewhat the availability of that, we diverted those of our men who were in a position to be helpful to the commercial growers, so that the commercial growers of sugar-beet seed have been assisted in selecting and siloing the sugar-beet root and in harvesting the seed, with the result that the largest crop of sugar-beet seed ever produced in the United States, about 4,000 acres, has been grown this year.

So I think it is rather an encouraging report.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations in foreign seed and plant introduction, including the study, collection, purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries and from our possessions, and for experiments with reference to their introduction and cultivation in this country, $93,040.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, and I do it in order to get a proposition before the committee which I think ought to be brought to its attention.

The testimony before the committee, and the notes submitted with the estimates, indicate that $12,500 of this sum is to be spent in the construction of buildings and the improvement of land which has recently been donated to the Government. I have always understood that before any department of the Government could accept a donation of land it must have legislative authority from Congress. I do not know of any legislative authority authorizing the acceptance of these two grants, one of them at Miami, Fla., and the other one at Bellingham, Wash. Especially in view of the fact that the testimony shows that these two donations are made upon condition that the Government will continue to use them, and that the land will revert back unless used as prescribed in the deeds, I do not think it good public policy to spend money in the erection of buildings upon the land or its improvement. I do not think there is anything which authorizes the appropriation, and unless something can be shown I shall make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I do not concede the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I should like to know what the gentleman's point is.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not sure that I can get at the proposition with a point of order.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman wishes, he may offer an amendment cutting out the $12,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. I shall do that, unless it can go out on a point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I am satisfied it is not subject to a point of order. The gentleman had better make it the other way, to save time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I move to amend by striking out "$93,040" and inserting "$80,540."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, there is an increase in this item of $10,000 for the establishment of a plant-introduction field station at Bellingham, Wash. It seems that the department has a field station at Bellingham, Wash., and there is proposed to be donated to the Government a 60-acre tract of land adjacent to the present propagating garden. This 60-acre tract of land, according to the testimony before the committee, is valued at $25,000 or $30,000. Private parties have offered to deed that property to the Government and it is estimated that $10,000 will be necessary to cover the equipment and extension of the field work at that station over these 60 acres of land that are ready to be given to the Government for these purposes.

The bulb industry of this country is a much larger proposition than most of us would suspect. If my recollection is correct, I think the importation of bulbs to this country amounted at one time to something like $1,000,000 per year, and the committee felt that, having the offer of property worth $60,000 to be used in the propagation of bulbs it could very well afford to expend $10,000 to avail itself of that offer, which would put us in a position to do very valuable work. It is true that it will not add to the meat supply of the country, or the wheat supply, or other food supply, but it will add to the joy of those who love the beautiful in nature.

Mr. SLOAN. What, if any, conditions are submitted with the proposition to convey?

Mr. LEVER. No conditions whatever, except, as I recall it, that the land shall be used for the purposes set forth in the deed.

Mr. SLOAN. If not used for that purpose will the land revert to the donors?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, I understand so. The committee felt that this was a good undertaking. I will say further that the department recommended, a little further on, an appropriation of $35,000 for the purchase of not to exceed 150 acres of land at Chico, Cal. The committee disallowed that proposition, because we did not feel that we ought to go into it at this time; but where we had a station already established and could get $60,000 worth of property at an expenditure of $10,000 for maintenance, we thought it was a fairly good business proposition.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, supplementing the statement of the chairman of the committee, I would like to make this further observation in connection with the statement which the chairman made with reference to the existing bulb farm or garden at Bellingham, Wash.: The fact is that that garden has been maintained on a tract of 10 acres of leased ground for a number of years, I think eight or nine years, and the lease expires, as I understand it, some time in the current year and can not be renewed. There is a current appropriation from year to year, I think, of $7,500 for the propagation of bulbs on that tract. With the expiration of the pending lease it becomes necessary for the Government to make further arrangements for the maintenance of that industry, for the propagation of bulbs in that locality. The site tendered by private parties is stated to be worth some $25,000 or $30,000, I believe, and is a few miles away from the present garden. It is proposed to transfer the work to this new station and to expend the money upon a 60-acre tract instead of a 10-acre tract, to maintain the present bulb-culture work, and also to extend the station to meet the demands of the department in the propagation of, or experimentation with, other foreign plants. According to the statement made, they feel that a wider range of experimentation, with diversified plants from the Orient and elsewhere, is necessary, and that this locality has been demonstrated to be exceptionally fitted for that purpose. Therefore, with the tender of 60 acres to the Government and with the pending failure of the leasehold interest of the Government some time during the current year, it becomes a matter of practical moment to the Government itself to accept the tender of the deed and to have the appropriation made as proposed.

I wanted to make this additional statement in connection with the statement of the chairman.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the gentleman any estimates of the value of this land?

Mr. HADLEY. The testimony before the committee was that it was worth from $25,000 to $30,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the gentleman any personal knowledge of its value?

Mr. HADLEY. I would not undertake to testify to the actual value without a personal examination of the land. I know of it in a general way. It is within a mile or two of the limits of a city with 30,000 population or more, and is adjoining improved highways on either side. It is a tract of very valuable land. It is worth several hundred dollars an acre without question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is a peculiar situation and illustrates the wisdom of a careful reading of bills. Here is a proposition to cover up the purchase of land by the department——

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hear the gentleman from Illinois say "not at all," but I challenge the gentleman or the chairman of the committee to show wherein from line 5 to line 18, page 24, providing an appropriation of $93,000 there is any authorization whatever concerning any real estate in Bellingham, or any other place except in Arlington, Va. It is only another evidence of the wickedness of lump-sum appropriations to be used in the discretion of the department. Ninety-three thousand dollars for experiments with reference to the introduction and cultivation in this country of bulbs. Not a word about Bellingham, not a word about the purchase of real estate, not a suggestion in the item that real estate is to be used at all for the propagation for these plants and bulbs. The gentleman from Washington states that the idea is that we are to bring in the plants and bulbs from the Orient. I do not know whether the gentleman from Washington knows it, or whether the chairman of the committee knows it, but the State Department at the present time is powerless in regard to certain importations of bulbs and things of that kind from Europe. It may be that we are going to build up the oriental trade by permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to inject an item here providing in a lump-sum appropriation the right to acquire real estate with attendant expenses. It may be that the purpose to build up the trade on the west coast is commendable, but it is interesting to note that the trade from Europe is actually held up because this Nation is powerless to obtain certain imports because of the domination of the high seas by one of the great powers of the world.

I am not going into that further than to say that men engaged in the bulb business along the Atlantic seaboard are anxious to obtain imports from foreign countries, but can not readily secure them. I am not raising that question now except to say that to our shame possibly, we are at least temporarily under the domination of a foreign power in this matter. It is a wicked provision that appropriates $93,000 to investigate plants and the propagation of bulbs if it includes or covers the purchase of real estate.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. It would not be such a wicked proposition to bring the bulbs up through the intercoastal canal, would it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's suggestion is about as wicked as this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is always interesting and entertaining, but sometimes mistaken. This provision does not provide, authorize, or contemplate the purchase of real estate. The gentleman probably got his information incorrectly from some one without reading the item. It is not intended to purchase real estate. My friend from Pennsylvania says there is nothing in the item to indicate that real estate is to be used in any way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said there was nothing about real estate in the item except at Arlington, Va.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was raised on a farm, and yet does not know that when it comes to propagating bulbs it is necessary to use real estate. I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks that they are propagated on a carpet. Somebody by me suggests that probably the gentleman thinks they are brought up on a bottle. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In view of the gentleman's experience on his own farm, I assume he knows the carpet or milk-bottle price. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I have raised bulbs on real estate, and have had no difficulty in buying imported bulbs this last fall, which the gentleman says can not be imported. There is no difficulty in getting these bulbs. The fact is that we import immense quantities of bulbs every year from Holland. Holland centuries ago developed the art of propagating tulip bulbs, and a great many other kinds of bulbs. We spend large sums of money every year, sending our money over to buy these bulbs which are propagated in other countries, particularly in Holland. The Department of Agriculture some time ago reasoned that they probably would be able to propagate these bulbs on the Pacific coast, figuring out the climate and the soil, and we have made the effort, and so far it has looked to be very successful. If the Department of Agriculture is permitted to continue this investigation, it is my own opinion that in a short time, instead of buying bulbs from Europe, we will be raising them on our own labor and our own capital on the Pacific coast. I do not know anything that would be better for the same amount of money expended than to demonstrate that this can be done. This is not exactly along the line of protection which the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I both favor, but somewhat along the line, because it proposes to use the money of the Government in showing the people of this country how they can do the things, how they can produce the things which we now buy abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds; for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops, including the investigation of the utilization of cacti and other dry-land plants; and to conduct investigations to determine the most effective methods of eradicating weeds, $139,180: Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $60,000 may be used for the purchase and distribution of such new and rare seeds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information. Why is it necessary to couple with an appropriation for the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds one to conduct investigations to determine the most effective methods of eradicating weeds?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the language to which the gentleman refers was, I think, inserted in the bill on the floor of the House in the last session of Congress. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN] has that information.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, there was $5,000 inserted by the House at the last session to investigate the best method of eradicating weeds. That was misunderstood in the Senate, and went out of the bill. The department said that they considered it of enough importance so that they would undertake the work without additional appropriation, and they tried to take it out of this, and they conducted an investigation last year and they are going to continue it this year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that an item for the investigation of the best and most effective method of eradicating weeds should be coupled with an appropriation of this character and in an item of this kind. It does not look consistent. Here you have an appropriation of $139,180, of which not more than $60,000 may be used for the purchase and distribution of such new and rare seeds. We know nothing about how much of the remainder can be used for the investigation of and the eradication of weeds, or how much of it can be used for the investigation and improvement of grasses, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. My understanding that the eradication of weeds contemplated here was in connection with alfalfa and other forage crops?

Mr. HAUGEN. No.

Mr. MANN. I supposed it was. Everyone know that weeds get into fields of alfalfa.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Weeds get into anything; but I do not see the consistency of coupling up such an item with an item for the purchase, propagation, and so forth, of new and rare seeds.

Mr. ANDERSON. This proposition, I think, had reference particularly to the eradication of the sow thistle.

Mr. MANN. It would not be profitable to plow up a field of alfalfa to get out a few weeds. Weeds in a field of perennials are very different from weeds in a field of annuals.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman that it would not be altogether profitable to plow up a field of alfalfa to get out the weeds; but that does not make me see the propriety of putting an item of this character, without any limitation as to amount that can be expended for the purpose, in with an item for the purchase and propagation and distribution of rare plants, seeds, and so forth. I think it should be carried in some other item.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I disagree with anything that the gentleman has said. This item is at the wrong place in the bill; but it is here, and it got into the bill in the way suggested by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN], and the committee in framing a bill to pass at the short session of Congress went upon the theory that the fewer changes made in the bill the easier the bill would go through the House, and therefore we have left it here. I think there is a great deal of force in the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest that the best way to correct a thing of that kind is for the House to make the correction in the committee and put it in at a proper place. This does not show how much can be used for that purpose and how much can be used for the very different purpose.

Mr. LEVER. I can give the gentleman assurance that not over $10,000 will be used for this purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, the item itself does not show.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true; but that is true of all of these lump-sum appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $243,720. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided, also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, in order to test the sense of the committee, I move to strike out the paragraph. I want to call attention to the fact that this item carries $243,720 for the purpose of purchasing and distributing radish and lettuce seeds and other garden seeds and some flower seeds and a few shrubs throughout the country, which are not desired by the people of the country, and, so far as I am concerned, they have become an embarrassing situation. Of course, I send them out because they are put to my credit at the Department of Agriculture, but I think there is no better place for us to start to retrench and save a little money than by cutting out this item of $243,000.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Has the gentleman some seeds that he does not need?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No.

Mr. MEEKER. If he has, he might send them to me.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The amount is really $250,000, is it not, because on page 13 of the report it is stated that there is an apparent decrease in this item of $8,000, whereas, as a matter of fact, there is no decrease because it is put on another item?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is the same.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. In certain portions of Texas the Department of Agriculture conducts experiment farms for the improvement of cotton seed, and at the end of the season they buy a certain number of these cotton seed and furnish them for free distribution through the South. Does this item cover seeds of that kind?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; this is another item and includes only garden seed and flower seed and some shrubs.

Mr. BLACK. I am not a member of the committee and was not sure whether the distribution of that kind was covered by this item or not.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not a fact that a number of farmers' organizations passed resolutions against this seed distribution, including the National Grange?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They have.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). The ques- is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 44.

Mr. DOOLITTLE and Mr. RUBEY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi and Mr. DOOLITTLE took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREST SERVICE.

Salaries, Forest Service: One Forester, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief of office of accounts and fiscal agent, $2,620; 1 inspector of records, $2,400; 7 district fiscal agents, at $2,120 each; 1 forest supervisor, $2,800; 1 forest supervisor, $2,700; 8 forest supervisors, at $2,400 each; 20 forest supervisors, at $2,200 each; 48 forest supervisors, at $2,000 each; 66 forest supervisors, at $1,800 each; 5 forest supervisors, at $1,600 each; 1 deputy forest supervisor, $1,800; 4 deputy forest supervisors, at $1,700 each; 28 deputy forest supervisors, at $1,600 each; 31 deputy forest supervisors, at $1,500 each; 18 deputy forest supervisors, at $1,400 each; 10 forest rangers, at $1,500 each; 22 forest rangers, at $1,400 each; 78 forest rangers, at $1,300 each; 287 forest rangers, at $1,200 each; 650 forest rangers, at $1,100 each; 80 forest guards, at $1,100 each, for periods not exceeding six months in the aggregate; 1 clerk, $2,100; 4 clerks, at $2,000 each; 19 clerks, at $1,800 each; 21 clerks, at $1,600 each; 9 clerks, at $1,500 each; 22 clerks, at $1,400 each; 9 clerks, at $1,300 each; 136 clerks, at $1,200 each; 95 clerks, at $1,100 each; 53 clerks, at $1,020 each; 30 clerks, at $960 each; 117 clerks, at $900 each; 2 clerks, at $840 each; 1 clerk or proof reader, $1,400; 1 clerk or translator, $1,400; 1 compiler, $1,800; 1 draftsman, $2,000; 1 draftsman or surveyor, $1,800; 3 draftsmen, at $1,600 each; 1 clerk or compositor, $1,600; 2 draftsmen or surveyors, at $1,600 each; 13 draftsmen or surveyors, at $1,500 each; 2 draftsmen or surveyors, at $1,400 each; 2 draftsmen, at $1,500 each; 9 draftsmen, at $1,400 each; 4 draftsmen, at $1,300 each; 13 draftsmen, at $1,200 each; 2 draftsmen, at $1,100 each; 3 draftsmen, at $1,020 each; 1 draftsman, $1,000; 1 draftsman, $960; 12 draftsmen or map colorists, at $900 each; 1 draftsman or artist, $1,200; 1 draftsman or negative cutter, $1,200; 1 artist, $1,600; 1 artist, $1,000; 1 photographer, $1,600; 1 photographer, $1,400; 1 photographer, $1,200; 1 photographer, $1,100; 1 lithographer, $1,200; 1 lithographer's helper, $780; 1 blue-printer, $720; 1 machinist, $1,260; 2 carpenters, at $1,200 each; 3 carpenters, at $1,000 each; 1 carpenter, $960; 1 electrician, $1,020; 1 laboratory aid and engineer, $1,000; 9 laboratory aids and engineers, at $900 each; 2 laboratory aids and engineers, at $800 each; 1 laboratory helper, $720; 1 laboratory helper, $600; 1 packer, $1,000; 1 packer, $780; 4 watchmen, at $840 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $960; 3 messengers or laborers, at $900 each; 4 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 3 messengers or laborers, at $780 each; 4 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 6 messengers or laborers, at $660 each; 5 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 2 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $540 each; 3 messengers or messenger boys, at $480 each; 3 messengers or messenger boys, at $420 each; 11 messengers or messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 charwoman, $540; 1 charwoman, $480; 1 charwoman, $300; 11 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $2,447,920.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I assume that the duties of the chief of office of accounts and fiscal agent are virtually those of the chief clerk. I therefore make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against the salary carried for that office in lines 3 and 4, page 28.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order and offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold that? Before withdrawing the reservation of the point of order I would like to inquire what is the need of increasing the salaries of these district fiscal agents?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the department as to that is that these agents are in charge of the disbursing and receiving of moneys and of accounting work in district headquarters and have large financial responsibility. The present salaries are below those paid by other departments for similar service. These men are under $50,000 bonds and have large responsibilities, according to the statement of Mr. Graves, who has charge of this service.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salary was recommended by the head of the department?

Mr. LEVER. Two hundred and fifty dollars increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I only press the point of order as to the chief of office of accounts and fiscal agent, and I withdraw the reservation as to the last item.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in lines 3 and 4 "one chief officer of accounts and fiscal agent, $2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Apache National Forest, Ariz., $8,079.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to bring to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture a serious protest which I have received from the stockmen in my State relative to the proposed increase in grazing fees on the national forests. As I understand the situation, the cost of administering the grazing on the national forests is now more than repaid by the grazing fees received, but it is proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture to increase the rates, in order to place the grazing within the national forests on a commercial basis. At the time the national forests were created it was never contemplated that the grazing fee should be based upon what the traffic would bear, and, as a matter of fact, if cattle and sheep were not grazed within the forests and the grass was allowed to grow, there would be greater injury to the timber by fire than exists. Therefore, the grazing of live stock tends to preserve the timber. But the Forest Service has of late changed its policy and now proposes to place the grazing on the national forests on a commercial basis; in other words, to get all out of it that it is possible to obtain. Now, when the live-stock interests in my country, on the national forests of Arizona, are paying enough to cover the cost of administration and more, the stockmen feel that they should not be further taxed to make up a deficit that occurs elsewhere in the administration of the Forest Service. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the Committee on Agriculture has recommended this increase or is in any way responsible for it?

Mr. LEVER. The Committee on Agriculture does not have power by straight legislation to regulate these fees. That power has been delegated to the Forest Service. It was brought to the attention of the committee by the gentleman in charge of the forest work in this country that it was contemplated in the future to raise the grazing fees in the Forest Service probably 100 per cent, covering a period of about three years. The impression made upon my mind by those gentlemen who presented the case for the department was that this proposed increase in the grazing fees upon the national forests was entirely satisfactory to the bulk of the cattle and sheep men of the West.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can state to the gentleman that such is not the case so far as the cattle growers and woolgrowers of Arizona are concerned.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit. And I understood that they would be gratified, as a matter of fact, if the department adopted the policy of increasing more largely the grazing capacity on ranges by proper fencing and digging of water holes, and the like of that—matters that go in the cattle business. Now, the committee has acted upon that theory, and in another section of the bill has made provision for increasing the usefulness for grazing of the national forests by allowing an increase in that item of $50,000. It was brought to the attention of the committee, as I said a moment ago, that the cattlemen and sheepmen, if those conditions were met, would be entirely satisfied with the raise proposed by the Department of Agriculture. The present grazing fees are almost nominal, as the gentleman quite well understands.

The present charge ranges from 48 cents to $1 a year upon cattle, with a charge of 25 per cent of that rate for sheep, and more than that rate for horses. Now, to the minds of the committee those are quite reasonable fees. In fact, to the minds of the committee they are almost a nominal fee, and the committee, I think, feels that if a reasonable increase of the grazing fees can be had without any undue hardship upon anybody, at the same time carrying with it the idea of increasing the grazing capacity of the ranges, it would not be a bad thing to do.

Mr. HAYDEN. But what I wanted to ask——

Mr. LEVER. And if the gentleman will permit me further, we have testimony to the effect that the cattlemen and the sheepmen would agree to that proposition. Let me read a letter addressed to the Secretary of Agriculture recently. I read:

The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C.:

The members of the Blue Mountain Cattle & Horse Raisers' Association, Umatilla County, Oreg., offer no objection to the proposed increase in grazing fees, provided, first, that after this proposed increase is made the stockmen be assured that no further increase will be made; and, second, that an adequate percentage of the increased fee be appropriated each year for range improvements, etc.

As I said at the beginning of my statement, the impression made by the officers of the Forest Service upon the committee was that if the department adopted the policy of improving the range conditions, the cattlemen and the sheepmen would have no particular objection to a reasonable increase in the grazing fee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CONRY). The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. What I wanted to ascertain was whether or not the Committee on Agriculture of the House and the members of the committee were responsible for this raise?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no. The raise has not gone into effect as yet, as a matter of fact.

Mr. HAYDEN. In proposing such a raise in grazing fees?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask that question because of the statement given out by the Forester that, stung by the criticisms in Congress to the effect that the Forest Service is not securing from the national forests all the revenue that should be produced, he has recommended this increase in the grazing rates.

Mr. LEVER. I want to be entirely fair with the Forest Service. There has been undoubtedly in the past very severe criticism of the Forest Service because the receipts from that service have not been greater. Individual Members of the House have come to me, even this morning, complaining that the forests ought to be self-sustaining, and that the fees and the rents and the like of that are too small. Members have complained to me as to these grazing fees—complained to me personally, and probably the statement of the Forest Service, as given to us by the gentleman from Arizona, is based upon the truth. I am satisfied that members of the committee, probably in the cross-examination of the witnesses before it, have indicated more or less they think these fees were too small. We have not suggested to them the raising of the fees outright at all, but——

Mr. HAYDEN. The objection made by the stock raisers in Arizona is that the fees now collected more than pay the cost of administering the grazing in the forests of my State, and by doubling that fee the Forest Service is going to collect much more money and make a great profit off the grazing in that State—money which will be used to cover up the deficit occasioned by the necessity of conserving timber or other resources in other States and in other places in which they have no interest.

Mr. LEVER. There may be something in the gentleman's complaint, and I am satisfied that the department would be willing to make allowance for things of that kind.

Mr. HAYDEN. I realize that this proposed increase in grazing fees is to be made by a regulation issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that it is not a matter contained in this bill. I also know that it would be both vain and useless for me to offer an amendment prohibiting the Secretary from making the proposed advance, because such an amendment would be subject to the point of order that it was an attempt to legislate on an appropriation bill, which is prohibited under the rules of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arizona yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the fees for grazing have been raised?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; but it is proposed to raise them by increasing the rate in three annual increments, so that at the end of three years the rate will have been doubled.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So far as the Forest Service being stung by the criticisms that have been made of its administration, is it not a fact that the Forest Service, in order to devote the money which Congress is appropriating for roads in the forests, in order to make a showing in behalf of the grazing reserves, had to arbitrarily double the figures of the amount received from grazing?

Mr. HAYDEN. Evidently they are trying to get the money from somewhere, and the grazing fees seemed to be an easy place to get it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And naturally they are called upon to produce the sums necessary to cover the deficit arising on account of the expenditures they are making for roads.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, under the permission just granted me I desire to have printed in the RECORD the following letter from one who is fully conversant with the methods of the Forest Service, and which clearly sets forth the position of the stockmen of Arizona:

Mr. WILLIAM BABBITT,
President Coconino Cattle Growers' Association,
Flagstaff, Ariz.

MY DEAR MR. BABBITT: You have no doubt recently received correspondence relative to the proposed increase in the grazing fees on national forests until in 1919 the fees will be double the present rate.

This I believe to be of vital importance and a question upon which some immediate action should be taken.

From a letter recently signed by the Secretary of Agriculture relative to this proposed increase is the following:

"One of the leading criticisms of the management of the national forests is that they are not self-supporting and are a burden upon the National Treasury."

Our national-forests areas were originally withdrawn and are still maintained to conserve the great natural resources of the West. This has placed in Government control beyond individual exploitation, except under Government regulation, unknown millions of dollars in natural wealth which is and will continue to be increasingly of vast importance to the Nation.

In California there are forests withdrawn for no other purpose than the protection of watersheds on which the grazing of live stock is such a negligible factor that it could not be considered.

In Florida areas have been withdrawn under Forest Service management to protect the turpentine industry.

In Oklahoma is a forest withdrawn for the purpose of perpetuating the buffalo, and in the Northwest are forests withdrawn to conserve the timber, and on which practically no stock graze.

In spite of the fact that the national forests were withdrawn and are now maintained to conserve the great natural wealth of the West, which grows more valuable at a tremendous rate as time goes on, and which is a national investment of incalculable value to the whole people.

In spite of the fact that the moneys derived from grazing on the forest more than offsets the cost of its administration.

In spite of the fact that there are turpentine forests in Florida, buffalo forests in Oklahoma, hardwood forests in the Appalachians, and softwood forests in Washington in which the stockman has no interest except such as any other citizen would have, yet they are asking the grazing permittees to make up the fiscal deficiencies on these forests from Palm Beach to Seattle and from the Appalachians to the Pacific coast, and that this is the purpose of this proposed increase is most conclusively borne out by the following quotation from District Forester Reddington's letter in support of this advance in fees:

"The great criticism of national forest administration is that they are not self-supporting. This change will make them so."

If the great timber forests of the Northwest, the watershed withdrawals on which the grazing of live stock is prohibited, that the water may not be polluted nor the valleys flooded, and all the others that are not self-supporting, are worth conserving and maintaining, then this great Government of the United States should bear the expense of the maintenance of such units as are of no direct benefit to specific communities, and the cost of administering those units withdrawn for the benefit of separate communities should be borne by those directly benefited and not attempt to wring from the meat producers of the West this deficit under the guise that grazing privileges on national forests are worth double what they now are compared with the price paid on Indian reservations and private lands, thus placing the arbitrary value on the privileges with no more argument or study in support of it than has so far come to light.

Relative to the "bonus" paid on stock using the forests, this same statement can be made to apply to the public domain, the Indian reservations, and wherever stock are grazed, and when the time comes that a bonus can not be paid for located stock over and above their market value on board the cars a period is reached in the use of that range which shows most surely that other conditions are unfavorable in the extent that it would not pay to locate there, because everyone knows that it costs money to locate stock on an unfenced range and can not be done without loss.

I have read with interest the article by T. S. Woolsey, jr., in the June, 1916, issue of the Forest Quarterly, "National forest revenue and organization." He makes the statement that grazing fees on national forests should be two or four times as much as at present, and to prove this he cites the following, which I quote:

"For example, on the Apache Indian Reservation, the 1916 year-long rates for cattle were $2.50 and 50 cents for sheep. These rates were the result of competitive bid. Forest Service timber sale rates are in theory at least also fixed by competitive bid. On the Sitgreaves, which joins the Apache Indian Reservation, the year-long rate for cattle is 48 cents and for sheep 12 cents."

Such an unqualified statement, I believe, to be misleading to the public and should not go unchallenged.

Just what is the comparison between grazing on a national forest and an Indian reservation?

Sheep and cattle are not allotted to the same range on an Indian reservation, nor do they allow on the same area more than one permittee, which is of great advantage in the economic use of the area.

On a national forest they do.

On an Indian reservation a permittee may buy the stock and grazing privilege of the whole reservation if he so desires.

On a national forest he can not.

On an Indian reservation you may construct as many small inclosures as you desire without extra charge for the forest material necessary for its construction or the area involved.

On a national forest you can not.

On an Indian reservation the permittee is reimbursed for permanent improvements made on his allotment by the deduction of that amount from his grazing tax. On a national forest he is not.

On an Indian reservation the lease and privilege is for a term of five years, and no advance can be made during that time, which is of immense value to the lessee. On a national forest only an annual lease can be obtained, and a raise in fees possible each year.

Do permittees on an Indian reservation own patented land and water "commensurate" to their stock? On a national forest they are compelled to own land and sufficient water which, on the Coconino Forest mentioned in Mr. Woolsey's article, is more than enough to destroy the use of this forest for grazing purposes should the stockmen close their own water, at least until such time as more could be developed, which would be years, and then only in uncertain quantities. The stockmen have made the full utilization of the Coconino Forest possible at their own expense; and on the Canyon division of the Tusayan Forest, which joins the Coconino on the west, there is not a drop of water except that developed by the stockmen. This also applies to the northern portion of the Coconino of approximately one-half million acres. Furthermore, as you know, a drift fence was completed last summer at a cost to the cowmen alone of $10,000. Not only that, but the contract with the Government was so drawn that the cowmen must keep this fence in good repair for 10 years, at the end of which time it becomes the property of the United States. This fence was constructed to prevent the overstocking of national forests range and is in the interior of the forest and entirely on forest land. Mr. Woolsey also fails to mention the fact that the Coconino National Forest pays a net return over and above the cost of its administration of from $65,000 to $100,000 annually.

The live stock on the Indian reservation may change hands as often as desired without reductions, thus permitting the stockman to take every advantage of the live-stock market.

A grazing permit on a national forest must be held at least three years before it is transferable, and is then subject to a cut of 20 per cent.

And so on and on one restriction follows another until in actual fact and in actual operation there is no comparison between grazing privileges on a national forest and on an Indian reservation from a commercial standpoint, and the very best proof of this is that grazers on both the Sitgreaves and Coconino National Forest are making every effort to dispose of their holdings on these forests and go to the Indian reservation instead, but are hampered by the drastic regulations governing the transfer of their holdings on the forests.

The forest service has to this time expended hundreds of thousands of dollars to perfect and maintain a system for preventing and fighting forest fires; yet this would not be a "drop in the bucket" to what would have to be expended were it not for the live stock that keep the excess under cover and grass down to a point where the spread of fire is minimized. These areas would not be forests, but fire traps instead, which means a direct saving to the Government of vast sums of money in actual cash, besides an incalculable amount of valuable timber. I understand that the service is seriously considering the placing of live stock on parts of some forests where they do not now graze as the cheapest and most effective way of combating that greatest of all menaces to a forest—fire.

The Forest Service has spent thousands of dollars in an exhaustive study of the timber business, which goes into great detail as to the cost of logging, the cost of transportation, the cost of milling, the depreciation on the plant and rolling stock, capital invested and interest on same, and then sells the timber so that the manufacturer can have a fair profit, which to my mind is sensible and fair.

Has the stockman ever had such a study made of his business?

No. Yet the department has more than doubled the present rate on live stock and has set the last date of hearing for February 1, 1917.

The semiarid States of the West must always be the great breeding ground of the United States. National forests in these States will therefore always be a very important factor in the production of live stock and its products. The forests now embrace the high timberland principally adapted for summer use as a grazing ground, and they do not control winter forage land in a sufficient quantity to support the summer areas, and they are fully utilized now only because the woolgrowers find winter pasture far removed from the summer areas.

With the 640-acre homestead bill, with the constantly increasing difficulty experienced in trailing to their winter range, the time can not be far distant when there will be grazed on the forests only that amount of stock that can winter on the lands immediately adjacent to it, therefore I am of the opinion that the department should be urged to protect their summer areas by including enough winter range to support them.

When this is done and the Government obtains control of the land and water now owned by the stockmen, then, and not until then, in my opinion, can the grazing resources of the national forests be successfully commercialized in a manner that will rebound to the public good.

The Forest Service has promulgated and have now in force a regulated system of grazing on their forests of which they may justly be proud, covering an almost unbelievable range of conditions as wide as this great country itself. This has been possible through the very closest cooperation of the stockmen and the service, a condition enjoyed in no other branch of the Government service, irrespective of its age or worth. Shall this most beneficial condition be destroyed by placing this proposed arbitrary advance upon the grazing resources of our national forests without that measure of consideration and study as is employed in other forest commodities?

The cooperation and support extended the service in the past shows most conclusively that the stockmen not only do not fear but favor the regulation of their business based upon fairness and "the greatest good to the greatest number"; but they do fear regulation such as this proposed one, based, it pleases me to believe, on prejudice and misinformation in asking the stockmen to pay the interest on a Government investment of increasing value to the whole people.

Very truly, yours,

E. H. CRABB.

FLAGSTAFF, ARIZ., December 4, 1916.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in the price that the cattlemen pay, but I am interested in the method of distributing the permits among the cattle growers using the grazing lands. For example, we have a small national forest in my State, and years ago large herds, owned by a few men, were permitted to go in there. Since then the country has settled up, and the small homesteader would like to put in a few cattle; but still these large herds are shipped out in the spring and back in the fall, and pay no taxes, and the regulations are either wrong or are not adhered to. I know that they have regulations which provide for class 1 and class 2 and class 3 permittees, but someway, as a practical working of the proposition, they do not adhere to those regulations. I wanted to know if the chairman of the committee had heard any complaints from other sources?

Mr. COX. What is class 1?

Mr. FERRIS. Class 1 is a homesteader or a cattle owner who lives in close proximity to the forest, a near-by neighbor of the forest, so to speak.

Mr. COX. It does not take into consideration the number of cattle?

Mr. FERRIS. No. In my section the forest is small and the grazing area is limited, and it is worth a great deal to a cattleman to get his cattle into a reserve for a small permit tax for the season. The charge for a steer for the season, I think, is 50 cents, and he grows $10 worth of beef for the 50 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The inference is that the grazing of large herds of cattle makes it almost impossible for a man with a small herd to graze his cattle.

Mr. FERRIS. That is exactly the trouble. The point is, there are numerous complaints made to me every summer when I go home from people who say they can not get a square deal, who can not get their stock into the forest. I took the matter up with the Forest Service here, and they said they would make an order reducing the number, and they did make an order reducing it, but the reduction was only 10 per cent.

Now, the homesteaders would all starve to death or be driven from the country before they would ever get rid of a man with a herd of 10,000 or 15,000 cattle under a 10 per cent annual reduction. That is too slow a process, and there ought to be an equitable rule provided, either here or in the department, as to permitting cattle in these reservations when applications are made greater than the capacity of the forest range. Of course, where there is no demand on the forest, that would not be necessary. I have not framed an amendment and I presume I can work it out with the department. It has not been going just right on the grazing. I feel sure everything else is all right.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Oklahoma has asked me if any complaints have come to the committee as to that situation. I will say very frankly that no complaints have come.

We have received no complaints whatever. In the second place, I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I think every member of the Committee on Agriculture will agree with me, that year after year the committee have been given the impression by the officials of the Forest Service that their regulations and their sympathies were entirely with the small grazer.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not want to say enough to amount to an attack on them in their handling of it; I merely want justice done, as I am sure all concerned do.

Mr. LEVER. I appreciate that.

Mr. FERRIS. But this is what happens: It is a great deal easier for the superintendent of a forest to deal with one man owning 15,000 cattle than it is to deal with 15 men owning 1,000 cattle each. There is not so much trouble about dipping the cattle to get rid of the ticks, and there is not so much trouble about branding them, and rounding them up, and collecting the fee for the permits. They can collect from one man a great deal more easily than they can from several men, and the tendency is for the superintendent of the forest, and the rangers, and everybody else to sweep aside the little one-horse homesteader—with my apologies to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] about the homesteader—and to let the big fellow go on. I think the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture would do a good service for the homesteaders if he would look into that. If I can find the time, I want to give it some attention myself. I am a friend to the Forest Service, and I do not want them to make errors in handling the grazing.

Mr. LEVER. I am very glad to have the gentleman from Oklahoma call this matter to the attention of the committee.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

There are three matters in regard to the use of the forest reserves. Two of them are important and ought to be rectified and corrected. The first is that we permit no man who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become such, to obtain our public lands; therefore no man ought to be allowed to obtain a permit, directly or indirectly, for the use of the forest reserves unless he is a citizen of the United States or has declared his intention to become such. In my part of the country complaint has been made that men who are not citizens of the United States have been running large bands of sheep onto the reserves, driving away the home people. Second, boys who have grown up in the country, whose fathers have given them a little land, and who are starting out with a bunch of 25 or 50 cattle, can not get permits to run their cattle on the range where their fathers grazed the same cattle and in the community where the boys have grown up. Having been raised there and having helped to build up the country, they ought not to be excluded from the territory that they have made possible for settlement.

Now, third, as to this increase in the range fee, the people in my part of the country are up in arms against it. They think it is an injustice heaped upon them without any occasion. Several of these forest reserves are paying more now than their entire upkeep. Last night I got some letters and telegrams in regard to this matter. We have one reserve which pays more than $2,000 over and above the cost of upkeep. Yet the range fee is now to be doubled to men who, with their fathers before them, have lived there for 40 years and have helped to build up and maintain that country. They are to be taxed out of existence by this increased range fee when the amount collected is already more than enough to pay the entire expense of maintenance and upkeep, to say nothing of the receipts that will come from the sale of timber, and so forth. That these men should now be subjected to twice the previous charge does not seem right, and I want to appeal to the chairman of this committee that something be done so that this fee may not be raised.

It has been said—I am not going to be sponsor for the truth or falsity of it—that in a few sections of the country where the large cattlemen are desirous of driving out the small homesteaders, these large cattlemen have appealed to the department, asking that the fee be increased for the use of the range, so that the small man, with the expense of his farm and of the handling of these cattle, and the expense of raising his family and maintaining schools and other improvements, may be taxed so that he will not put any more of his cattle on the range, but will sell them out to the large stock owner. If that is true, it is unfortunate. It is true though that these people in my country are paying enough now to more than maintain the forest reserves, and the department ought not to be permitted to do it. I was figuring on offering an amendment, which, of course, would be subject to a point of order, prohibiting the department from increasing beyond a certain limit the forest-permit fees for those desiring to use the range.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Can the gentleman from California tell the committee how the grazing fee charged by private parties compares with that charged by the Government?

Mr. RAKER. Without having the figures before me I am not prepared to give them, but I think a double fee would be more than is charged by the local people in my country.

Mr. LEVER. In other words, the gentleman's statement would be that the private individual is getting twice as much as the Government is getting.

Mr. RAKER. Not for the same kind of land. The gentleman must remember that the ranges are not fenced, and there are places where cattle have to go from 5 to 10 miles for water, and much of the territory is open, rough, juniper, and lava-bed country, where they travel a long distance for water.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman know how much an acre the individual gets for grazing land?

Mr. RAKER. No; because it would differ as to locality.

Mr. LEVER. I have the figures here.

In California the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. obtained 5 cents per acre for land leased for sheep grazing, while similar and adjoining national-forest lands yield 1⅛ cents per acre. Is that about right?

Mr. STAFFORD. No wonder there are protests.

Mr. RAKER. That does not cover the question. The law has been such that the Southern Pacific Co. could control the land because they own it. Under the law if my animals trailed onto the land they took them up and I was subject to trespass. But under the law enacted by the last legislature when the holdings are not closed they are open to the commons and they do not find themselves in a position to rent the land as they did before. And still that does not answer the question. The reservations were not created for the purpose of making money for the Government; they were not created for the purpose of fleecing farmers out of what little profit they might make. They were made for the purpose of protecting the forests, for the purpose of conserving the Government's property. If you are going into a money-making business and charging all that the traffic will bear, if you are going to charge an amount equal to that of privately owned lands that are fenced, then you simply say you are going into competition with privately owned lands, and are going to charge the same price as those who own privately owned lands, and that that is the purpose of the reserves. If that is so, the real purposes of the reserves have been forgotten, and now it is a question primarily of how much money can be taken to assist the Government. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the committee may relieve the situation.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Complaint as to charges made by the Forestry Service for grazing is not new. We have heard it every time an appropriation bill from the Committee on Agriculture has been considered in the House. And it is not strange that complaints were made when it was proposed to charge for grazing on the public lands, because previous to the organization of this service no charge whatever had been made. People had been accustomed to use the ranges without paying anything for them. They resented the action of the service and Congress in imposing any charge whatever.

I have some figures here in the report by the Forester as to the relative charges made by private interests and the Forestry Service, which in this connection may be interesting. It says that the present users of the national-forest ranges are paying much less than the prevailing local rates on private, State, and Indian lands. In Montana, lands of the Northern Pacific Railroad leased for sheep grazing bring the equivalent of 25 cents per head as against a charge of 5 cents on adjoining national-forest lands. On the Crow Indian Reservation, in the same State, competitive bids realized 81 cents for sheep, while cattle grazers bid $3; on adjoining national forests the sheep rate is 13½ cents and the cattle rate 54 cents. On the White Mountain and San Carlos Indian Reservations, in Arizona, cattle pay $2.40, horses $3, and sheep 50 cents; on adjoining national-forest lands, quite as good, cattle pay 48 cents, horses 60 cents, and sheep 12 cents. In California the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. obtains 5 cents per acre for land leased for sheep grazing, while similar and adjoining national-forest land yields 1⅛ cents per acre.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman know where that land is?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I take it that the Forester is making a truthful statement.

Mr. RAKER. I am not questioning that, but the gentleman must remember that California is 800 miles long.

Mr. LEVER. But these comparisons are on adjoining land.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes; it compares adjoining lands. The Forester says "on adjoining national forest lands quite as good," and as to the lands in California he says "on similar and adjoining national forest lands." The charge on the Government land is about one-quarter of that charged by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. Now, the Forestry Service is not treating the settlers out there or anyone else harshly.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman think it is right and fair for the Government to charge more—considerably more—than all the expense of maintaining one of these forest reserves and then doubling the fee to the users?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I think, as a business proposition, the Government ought to charge for the use of the forests what they are worth, proper consideration being given to small holders and actual settlers who are struggling to make homes in or adjacent to the forests.

Mr. RAKER. And abandon the protection theory of the forests and go into the commercial business of leasing range lands?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. We have not abandoned that idea. We have been protecting and developing forests, encouraging settlement, and regulating it from the beginning, and what has been done by the Forestry Service is helpful to the actual settler. Timber to a large amount is given to the settlers; they get all the timber they want for their own use without any charge whatever. Many of them get grazing without charge.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman realize that there are many men who used to cut wood for their hotels, for their dwellings, but now people who go up there can not get old dead trees to burn in their stoves?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I realize that years ago there was no protection for the forests and no regard on the part of anyone, settler or cattleman, for the rights of the Government in the land it owned. There was waste and deliberate and wholesale appropriation to private use of the country's resources, and without regard for the public interest. It is refreshing to know that public property and the interests of the public are now conserved and protected.

Mr. RAKER. That was before the settlement of California.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The Forester, in his last annual report, announced a change of policy relative to grazing fees. They propose an annual increase for three years in grazing fees, which will aggregate at the end of that period on the average a doubling of the present fee. I assume that will not be the result in all cases, because I take it for granted that in some cases the present fees will be increased more than in others. The authority to charge these grazing fees does not rest on any legislation carried in this bill. Neither would any amendment that might be offered to this bill affecting the fees be likely to be favorably considered. As a matter of fact, any such amendment that might be offered would be subject to the point of order, so that it would be entirely useless for any of the western Members who feel aggrieved by reason of this proposed increase to offer an amendment to this bill or a proposition upon this bill to prevent it. Several gentlemen have expressed their views as to the propriety of these increases. Of course, those of us who represent western constituencies where there are large forestry areas are all anxious to have our people secure the benefits of these reserve areas with as little burden as possible, but we realize that we can scarcely expect that they shall have these benefits continuously while the Government is expending large sums of money on the reserves without some fair and reasonable payments.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. The question is—and this discussion is rather academic because we can not remedy this situation now—is the proposed increase fair and reasonable? I now yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the people in Arizona are of opinion that it is unfair and unreasonable because they are now collecting from those forests more than enough to pay for the administration of the grazing, and it was always their understanding that that was the limit of charge to be placed upon them. It is of no interest to your constituents or to mine whether lands are conserved in some other State for the benefit of the whole people of the United States. If these forests in other parts of the country are to be preserved for the benefit of all of the country, all of the country should pay for preserving them, and the burden should not be placed on the gentleman's constituents and mine.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes he does not need to make that argument to me, for I agree with him. That is an argument which may properly be made to the House.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the gentleman think that we have reached a proper state of collection when they have collected enough from the permits to pay for the running expenses in handling a particular reserve?

Mr. MONDELL. By and large and in the main that would seem to be a proper adjustment; but I want to address myself to the situation now before us. The question is, Will these increases be fair and reasonable? My own opinion is that if the Forestry Service doubles its grazing fees, the total will be a sum which will be burdensome and unfair and inequitable. On the other hand, I imagine there are some forests where the grazing fees might properly be slightly increased without burden——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no doubt but that the Forestry Service wanted to be entirely fair in its comparisons as between the present fees on the reserves and the fees or charges made by private parties or on Indian Lands, but I think the department is not accurate in all of its comparisons. I am very well acquainted with some of the territory referred to in the comparisons. I know, for instance, that there is no land on a national forest anywhere in the vicinity of the Crow Reservation that is anything like as valuable for grazing purposes, acre for acre, as the Crow Indian lands along the Big and Little Horn Rivers. Those lands have a very considerable rainfall for that country and do produce a very considerable amount of very excellent grasses, while the grasses on the Big Horn Forest Reserve adjacent are of a different character, not so valuable for grazing purposes, and generally the amount of forage per acre is much less. Furthermore, you can not compare, ordinarily, on an acre-for-acre basis the value of forest reserves with those of privately owned lands or Indian lands or any other lands adjacent to the forest reserves for various reasons.

First, the grazer on the national forest has laid upon him certain duties and obligations. He pledges himself to aid and assist the Government whenever necessary in preventing and putting out fires, and sometimes those grazing live stock on the reserves perform services in this regard of very great value and at times at much greater cost to them than their grazing fees for a number of years. That obligation is not only somewhat of a burden, or likely to be, but it is of very great value and advantage to the Government, because it assures the Government of a certain number of people who are in the vicinity and whose duty it is to immediately assist in putting out a fire when one starts. Furthermore, privately owned lands, such as are leased, Indian lands, such as are ordinarily leased, are in the main very much more accessible than the mountain forest lands. In many cases those utilizing the national forests must drive their stock a very considerable distance, in some cases as far as 50 to 150 miles, in order to reach the grazing grounds, and the cost of taking the stock back and forth is considerable, and the cost of looking after stock in a mountainous region, an unbroken and inaccessible country, is very much more than it is in the lowlands, where the privately owned property lies. So that you can not well compare the two propositions. However, I think this is true, that we can scarcely hope that the grazing fees shall permanently in all cases remain as low as they have been. I am of the opinion, however, that the increase suggested by the department will not be justified in the majority of cases at least.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that the service contemplates an increase that is not justified. I am very confident that it is not justified on reserves in my State, where the grazing areas are a very considerable distance from the summer pastures, where the cost of driving the cattle and sheep is very considerable, and where the character of the grazing territory is not very satisfactory. I am in hopes before these increases are carried out as now suggested the Forestry Service will reconsider the matter and will where they insist on increases make them less than they now propose.

The Forest Service can, it is true, make this grazing privilege in many instances much more valuable than it is, and if the service in increasing in any given case will endeavor to make the privilege more valuable, it is possible the parties using the reserves may in the long run find themselves as well situated and as well satisfied as they now are. But this is not a very good time to increase the cost of meat, when it is higher than it ever has been in our history. This is hardly the proper time to make it more expensive than it has been in the past to produce beef and mutton, and therefore it is scarcely the proper or opportune time for placing any additional burdens upon those using the forest reserves for meat-producing purposes. As we can not prevent some increase by any action that we may take, we can only hope that the Forest Service in making such increases as it shall insist upon will give careful consideration to the existing conditions and make the increases, if any, much less than they now contemplate.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I realize there is nothing to be amended, nothing in particular to be done, but I am infernally sick of this tommyrot about grazing fees and grazing privileges. I have been in Congress for nearly six years advocating a sane and sensible theory of governmental leasing of the ranges, to the end of giving the small stockman an opportunity, the man without large capital, the only possible opportunity to conduct a grazing business. To-day the only place that a small man can make a living in the live-stock business is in conjunction with the forest reserves. The forest grazing fees up to date have been extremely low. I know that of my own knowledge, because I am paying them, and I am paying them cheerfully and am glad to pay them. The forest reserves can stand larger grazing fees. I doubt very much whether they ought to be generally doubled; but they can stand raising in many cases. This afternoon we are hearing foolish talk from men who have done everything in their power to destroy the live-stock business, men who have continually talked as if every inch of the West ought to be covered by agricultural settlers, in a portion of the country that will not support agriculture. I am dead sick of all this bunk and misrepresentation. The thing we ought to do, and I am sorry I am going out of Congress before we can get it done, is to realize that the Federal Government should recognize the live-stock industry as one worthy of support; recognize that the live-stock man, who is making the only use that can be made of certain arid sections of this country, is the one man that we ought to encourage and help. We should stop this attempt to break down range control, and cease attempts to cut it up by blackmailing homestead people destined to failure by misplaced effort. We ought to recognize the small stockman as the best friend of the arid region until such time as higher uses may be proven out. Under no plan but a leasing system can justice be done to the present and the future.

Now, I have been paying these grazing fees in the forest reserves. I am the first range owner in the State of Nevada to sustain a policy of forest reserves that contain no trees. It has been a good thing for Nevada that there should have been forest areas set apart, not for the preservation of the timber but for the proper preservation of the grass and other forage. In the business in which I am engaged we have benefited largely by such a policy, and it has been the same way all through the country. I believe that these fees can be raised in some localities without hardship or injustice. The grazing fees are now cheap. The relative charge of grazing with the present price of live stock is but a small percentage of cost; nothing as compared with the benefit derived from the protected certainty of securing forage. And if, as has been claimed, these fees are so low that they create a vested right that can be bartered and sold, then the blame is partly on the Agricultural Department that such rights are not subdivided and relet, and it is also up to the Agricultural Department to make the rates so reasonable and fair that they will no longer be a matter of barter and sale.

An immense area of our western country is only fit for grazing. The attempt should be made to give the small man a chance. He can not secure land enough to conduct his business except by leasing the public domain. He can afford to pay fairly for that privilege. The men declaiming against fair and adequate payment in the forest reserves are the same men who have treated the stockman as an outlaw.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I take it that those who obtain permits for grazing on forest reserves have sheep and cattle and are in competition with those who graze sheep and cattle on other land whether it be their own or leased land. I never have been able to see any reason why the Government of the United States should grant some special privilege to some special persons who were fortunate enough to obtain grazing permits in certain forest reserves. Everybody who raises sheep and cattle can not obtain these permits if they are lower and would be charged upon other land. And if it is to be a matter of favoritism purely for the benefit of those who obtain the grazing permits, then it is not fair to the other people who endeavor to produce cattle and sheep, and it is not fair to the general public. We ought to charge reasonable fees for grazing. They ought not to be essentially lower than would be paid by other persons for grazing upon other lands. Probably they can not be much higher, because you can not force people to take grazing permits and graze sheep and cattle. Unless there is a profit in the business or unless people think there is a profit in the business they will not take the permit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inyo National Forest, Cal. and Nev., $3,076.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in regard to this grazing fee, I have a letter in my hand of date December 29, 1916, from Alturas, Modoc County, Cal., signed by W. J. Dorris, who was born and reared in that county, a live, up-to-date, forward-looking gentleman, whose word is his oath, and who is one of our live citizens and a cattleman who has had broad and extensive experience in that matter. I want to read a few extracts from that letter to this committee. I read:

Not a very great while ago I received a copy of a letter sent out by the Secretary of Agriculture, notifying the purchasers of grazing upon the national forests that it is the intention to double the grazing fees.

Ex-President Roosevelt, recognizing the menace to the material progress of our country by the trend of the country population to the cities, appointed a commission to inquire into the causes of this exodus.

If the President of the United States wishes to keep the country population at home, developing the agricultural resources of the country, for goodness sake let him make it possible for the country individual to surround himself with those conditions which will make country life as pleasant and profitable as city life for the same amount of energy and intelligence employed. Then, and not until then, will the country boy be satisfied to remain at home on the paternal farm and work like the very dickens to make the soil yield forth its concealed treasure.

Trade is based upon production, and no country can advance faster than the resources placed within its reach by its producers. The ox can not draw the plow without his fodder, nor the bull's tail outrun his head.

It makes me "hot under the collar" to see the National Government resorting to this means of raising the tax on the stockman of Modoc County, just as if he is not already bearing his share of the expense of maintaining the Government. What, with the duty on farm equipment and the reduction of the duty on his farm and meat products, besides his State and county taxes, his present grazing fees, and whatnot, is he yet to have his taxes raised, in this indirect way, under the guise of an additional grazing fee, so that a well-paid official class having more luxury in one day than our Fitzpatricks, our Archers, and our Paynes enjoy in an entire month, may be built up and maintained upon the "sweat of his brow"? And just at a time when Modoc County, having recovered from the long depression and hard times in the live-stock industry, before the era of living prices came, is beginning to develop the internal resources of the county, a pall is to be placed upon the agricultural growth of the West, under an approaching cloud of overproduction of meats, which the observing see no way to get from under until the storm wears itself out, the breakers subside, and the survivors are able to reach port, battered hull listing in the tides, and tattered sails flapping in the breeze.

It seems to be the idea of the Secretary of Agriculture to commercialize the national forests and run them upon a basis of profit in competition with private enterprise, while Congress gives away the remaining lands in the public domain eventually to be controlled by monopolies.

I have voted for a lot of Democrats in the last few years, but if God will forgive me—

[Laughter and applause.]

I'll not do it again except in the case of one through friendship too strong to be broken by political ideas.

The trend of the Government is toward the reducing of the profits of agriculture and stock raising, and the building up of a well-paid office class of superior fiber, and the reducing of the farming and stock-raising classes to an inferior class upon the par of the peasantry of Europe.

The income of the Modoc National Forest to-day is more than sufficient to meet all legitimate expenses of its administration. For the year 1916 the receipts of this forest from all sources was $22,498.31 and the disbursements for the maintenance thereof were $19,612.72, leaving a net balance of profit for the year of $2,885.59.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want two minutes more to finish this.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. RAKER. Let me go on and make my request for unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. RAKER. Then I move to strike out the last two words of this paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point or order that the gentleman can not do that.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman will not stop me from that.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the way to do it.

Mr. RAKER. There is a way to do it, and I will make another motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. RAKER. I read further:

And the profit derived from grazing proportionately was considerably greater by reason of the proportionately smaller expense of managing the grazing upon the forest.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. RAKER. Is not this under the Forest Service, as to the expense of maintenance of a forest? The question involved is as to whether or not it is exorbitant or not. Surely it is. I read:

This is not an answer to the Secretary's letter, which I shall answer when impulse has time to yield to reason. To-day I feel just like calling names. I shall send you a copy and ask you to present it for us * * *. We have just received a splendid little book on the Diseases of Horses from you, which was prepared by this same Department of Agriculture that I have been writing about above. I thank you for it.

The letter is signed "W. J. Dorris."

My purpose in reading this letter to the committee is to impress the idea that those upon the ground best know the situation. This letter voices the sentiment of 99 per cent of the people in northern and northeastern and eastern California. Give these men a chance to swim. Do not load them down beyond their capacity and power to keep their heads above water. I am not here stating how much taxes I have assisted in paying upon the national forests, nor am I here stating that the first forest reserve that was created in the northern part of California was created at a meeting which I called, where the farmers came in and decided to establish that forest and assist in that way in building up the country. And while we are building up the country, it is not the purpose to tax those who live there out of existence and compel them to leave the country and deprive them of the necessary profits that ought to come to the country and bring in others in their place. There is no question but that it is a wrong policy on the part of the Government, and I believe eventually they will not be permitted to charge such a rate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. In view of the promise that was made that the Forest Service shall be self-supporting, and in view of the shortage that has existed, should not the Forest Service or the Government be permitted to make its promise good?

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman's question, that would be all right; but you ought not to go into the districts that are now paying more than what is necessary to make a forest in order to gather large revenues to scatter them in other parts of the United States. It is not fair nor right. It is not the way we do business in other parts of the country. You go to northern California and other forests and want to tax them to the very verge of bankruptcy in order that some other State might make a better showing, and charge a larger proportion of the amount in the grazing fee.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say "tax them"?

Mr. RAKER. It is the same thing as a tax.

Mr. MANN. Is it their property?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, it amounts to a tax. This idea of having the public domain in a State whereby the public may use it and the State or Government pays no taxes on it, is not fair. We build our roads, we build our trails, we protect the farmers, we protect the Government's property, and in turn the citizens that live in that community and pay these taxes and upbuild the country and maintain an efficient corps of officers should not be taxed out of existence in order that the Government might prosper and spend its money in some other place.

Mr. MANN. These people who have grazing permits do not build the roads. They only pay their share of the tax, and we pay a larger proportion of the taxes than they do into their county.

Mr. RAKER. Not in our county, because we are raising a large amount of money for the purpose of paying the taxes and building roads.

Mr. MANN. You are not paying it.

Mr. RAKER. Most of those public-domain roads have been built, and roads are being built to-day and being maintained by the county and the State.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. I was just about to suggest that the gentleman's complaint in this matter seems to be about like this: The farmer has 100 acres of land, 50 of which will not produce enough to pay for the work put upon the crop. Another 50 acres will produce a good deal more. The gentleman complains that the farmer is a business man enough to make that 50 acres of land do business. Is not that the complaint?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. LEVER. What is it?

Mr. RAKER. The complaint is that you are trying to tax our people on the Government land that they help to maintain and pay taxes to build roads, and so forth. They maintain their officers for the purpose of policing it, and now, because it is within a forest reserve, you want to double the tax and overburden them. I am inserting a letter from another gentleman, who lives in Alturas and who knows the facts, and it best demonstrates that these people are much perturbed over this contemplated increase on grazing fees—namely, a doubling of them. This should not be done; it is very unjust. Mr. Lynip's letter is as follows:

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
Alturas, Cal., December 21, 1916.

HON. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: We have been informed that there is an intention on the part of the Government to raise the range fees for live stock on the national forests, and that the national forest in Modoc is now self-supporting, and that with a raise in the fees a great hardship would result to the stock interests of this section, as compared with other sections adjacent to national forests, on account of our remoteness from market.

I am therefore writing you for information, per request of some of the members of the executive committee of the stock association, to ascertain what is the proper procedure to prevent a raise in the grazing-fee charges.

I am, thanking you for the anticipated courtesy of an early reply,

Yours, very truly,

B. F. LYNIP, Cashier.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nebraska National Forest, Nebr., $1,165; and to extend the work to the Niobrara division thereof, $5,000: Provided, That from the nurseries on said forest the Secretary of Agriculture, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, may furnish young trees free, so far as they may be spared, to residents of the territory covered by "An act increasing the area of homesteads in a portion of Nebraska," approved April 28, 1904: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to use so much of any of the funds herein appropriated for the Nebraska National Forest as may be necessary to acquire by purchase or condemnation lands in Nebraska which he may deem necessary and suitable for nursery sites to be used for the purpose of growing trees for planting on the Nebraska National Forest, and for other purposes, authorized by law. So much, not exceeding $1,200, of any funds hereafter appropriated for the Nebraska National Forest for any fiscal year to and including the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, as may be necessary, shall be available for the purchase of land now under lease and used as a nursery site for the Niobrara division of the Nebraska National Forest, $6,165.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. I take it that the gentleman is reserving his point of order as to the new language in the paragraph.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; the only part that I have any objection to is that in line 11—

And for other purposes authorized by law.

If that language can go out, I have no further objection to the paragraph, and I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order pending the statement of what is to be done on the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. The new language is clearly subject to the point of order. If the gentleman is going to make it, I do not think we need to take any time in discussing it. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] may be able to persuade his colleague to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the chairman of the committee that I do not know what that language is for, and I was going to rise to ask the honorable chairman what is the purpose of the language.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the department in its estimate says this:

The new language in this item will permit the department to acquire two small tracts of private land which are necessary in carrying on the nursery work authorized therein. The first tract contains about 18.25 acres. Through an error in the public-land surveys this tract was inadvertently included in the principal nursery which supplied the Nebraska National Forest when that nursery was established. The second tract, containing approximately 80 acres, constitutes the Niobrara nursery site, which for several years has been in use under a lease with an option for purchase. The addition of these tracts is essential to the successful development of reforestation in Nebraska, and suitable national forest land is not available for the purpose.

It was brought to the attention of the committee that the lease of this 80 acres of land was entered into some two years ago. It was a 10-year lease. They are now paying $100 per year as rent, and with $1,200 they can buy this land and own it themselves, and the committee thought that was a good investment.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I fully indorse the explanation made by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee; but I want to ask the chairman the purpose of this language:

Other purposes provided by law.

I understand the purpose of the appropriation is for the purchase of these small tracts of land. That has been regarded as necessary and expedient for several years, and I think it would be a very good investment.

Mr. LEVER. I confess I do not know why that language is in there. I know of no other purpose.

Mr. KINKAID. I know of no reason why it should be there.

Mr. LEVER. I am willing that it should be stricken out.

Mr. KINKAID. I do not know of any reason why it should be there, yet there may be some good reason.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman withdraws his point of order, I will ask to let the language go out.

Mr. COX. I want to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves a point of order.

Mr. COX. Is not the entire proviso new language?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; from line 5 to line 17 is new language.

Mr. COX. How much ground does the Government own there now—how many acres?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know just how many acres.

Mr. COX. Approximately?

Mr. LEVER. I should think probably 75 or 100 acres. I am not sure.

Mr. COX. The proposition is to buy 90 or 100 acres more?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; 98 acres.

Mr. COX. Is there any evidence before the committee showing how much the land would cost or what it is valued at?

Mr. LEVER. The proviso appropriates $1,200 for the entire 98 acres.

Mr. COX. I must confess that I have never read the hearings on this subject. What are they doing there, anyhow?

Mr. LEVER. By authority of law they are growing nursery stock for reforestation purposes and distributing the young trees to the people of Nebraska in that semiarid region.

Mr. COX. None of this nursery stock is being distributed outside of the State of Nebraska.

Mr. LEVER. I so understand.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to inquire if this is a part of the old Niobrara Military Reservation?

Mr. KINKAID. Oh, no. It is called the Niobrara division of the Nebraska National Forest because it is on the Niobrara River.

Mr. FOSTER. I wondered how close it was to the old reservation, or whether it was a part of it.

Mr. KINKAID. No; it is no part of it. It is more than 50 miles distant.

Mr. FOSTER. And never was a part of it?

Mr. KINKAID. Never was a part of it.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEVER. Has the Clerk reported the amendment which I offered?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been reported.

Mr. LEVER. In line 11, page 36, after the word "Forest," I move to strike out the words "and for other purposes authorized by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 11, strike out the words "and for other purposes authorized by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oregon National Forest, Oreg., $16,009.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move to strike out the last word. My notes indicate that the estimate for the Oregon National Forest was $6,009. The bill seems to carry $16,009, and I was wondering whether that $16,009 was an error, or whether the committee took some action with respect to that proposition of which I was not advised.

Mr. LEVER. No; that is undoubtedly a typographical error.

Mr. ANDERSON. It ought to be corrected.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that that part of the item be passed over temporarily until I can look into it. It escaped my attention.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the item will be passed over.

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee what the basis is for these different sums for the several national forests. How are they made up? I notice that they change from year to year; some increased considerably and some decreased.

Mr. LEVER. The changes are made on the basis of the estimates of the department as to the uses of the forests during the coming fiscal year, the amount of timber cut, the amount of grazing, and the amount of necessary work to be done on these forests in order to conserve them and to utilize them to the best advantage.

Mr. TILSON. I notice that in most cases it is an odd sum. For instance, here is one case where $10,537 is appropriated. The next year perhaps it is reduced by two or three thousand dollars, and yet it is still odd money, as if they knew to a dollar just how much it was going to cost to administer that particular forest for a year from July 1 next. I wondered how exact they were in their estimates.

Mr. LEVER. They could not possibly know to a dollar. They have 10 per cent leeway, which gives them a certain latitude, but these estimates are made according to their best judgment.

Mr. TILSON. Then the odd money as a rule is just a bluff to give the impression that they have been very careful in their administration and in their estimates?

Mr. LEVER. It figures out according to their estimates.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional national forests created or to be created under section 11 of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat. L., p. 963), and lands under contract for purchase or for the acquisition of which condemnation proceedings have been instituted for the purposes of said act: Provided, That hereafter all moneys received on account of permits for hunting, fishing, or camping, on lands acquired under authority of said act, or any amendment or extension thereof, shall be disposed of as is provided by existing law for the disposition of receipts from national forests, $66,100.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I assume that the method now pursued as to these funds received for permits for hunting, fishing, or camping revert to the Treasury. It is the opinion of many who have served here for some length of time that it is far better in the bookkeeping to have them go back to the miscellaneous fund of the Treasury, and I make the point of order on the proviso.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order. The gentleman makes the point of order against the language and not as to the amount?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not include the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of methods for wood distillation and for the preservative treatment of timber, for timber testing, and the testing of such woods as may require test to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, for investigations and tests of foreign woods of commercial importance to industries in the United States, and for other investigations and experiments to promote economy in the use of forest products, and for commercial demonstrations of improved methods or processes, in cooperation with individuals and companies, $155,600.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What is the purpose of the department in this new phraseology carried in the bill, "for commercial demonstrations of improved methods or processes in cooperation with individuals and companies"?

Mr. LEVER. I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the department in its laboratory at Madison, Wis., has discovered some improved processes in making paper from the waste of lumber operations from southern pine and other species, and they have utilized the bark waste and discovered some process of kiln-drying western larch and other species. It is the purpose of this language with an appropriation of $25,000 to demonstrate in the field or on a commercial scale in cooperation with individuals the methods that have been worked out in the laboratory at Madison, Wis.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is extending in practical work the experimental work of the laboratory?

Mr. LEVER. It is taking out into the field and putting into useful service the technical information that that great laboratory has gained in experimental work for many years.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I renew the point of order. I notice that last year there was in the bill, in line 23, after the word "tests," the words "within the United States." That language is omitted here.

Mr. MANN. Where else do they propose to conduct experiments except in the United States?

Mr. LEVER. Probably that language, in view of the action of the committee, ought to go back into the bill. The department estimated a considerable amount of money—I think $10,000—permitting them to examine into the forestry products in Latin America and some other countries. The committee took the position that we ought not to do that and disallowed the amount.

Mr. MANN. Then we ought to restore that language.

Mr. LEVER. I am inclined to think the gentleman is right. If the point of order is withdrawn, I will insert the language.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "tests," line 23, page 41, the words "within the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For other miscellaneous forest investigations, and for collating, digesting, recording, illustrating, and distributing the results of the experiments and investigations herein provided for, $33,140.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 36 of the bill, line 24, the Oregon National Park. I move to strike out the figures "16,009" and insert the figures 6,009." I am satisfied that was a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests, $450,000: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 may be expended for the construction and maintenance of boundary and range division fences, counting corrals, stock driveways and bridges, and the development of stock watering places on the national forests: And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the transportation or traveling expenses of any forest officer or agent except he be traveling on business directly connected with the Forest Service and in furtherance of the works, aims, and objects specified and authorized in and by this appropriation: And provided also, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article, but this shall not prevent the giving out to all persons without discrimination, including newspaper and magazine writers and publishers, of any facts or official information of value to the public;

In all, for general expenses, $3,263,275.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I remember when this item went into the bill in reference to newspaper and magazine writers and publishers. We make discrimination here against the Agricultural Department in favor of the Interior Department, which maintains a regular magazine, which it publishes all of the time. If we should apply this to the Interior Department it would stop that work, and if it is a good thing in the Interior Department why is it not a good thing in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. FOSTER. Does this prohibit them from publishing in connection with their work such publications as are issued from the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. MANN. Not at all; but the Interior Department issues a magazine. It is a regular magazine, just like any other magazine.

Mr. FOSTER. Does this prohibit the Agricultural Department from doing the same thing?

Mr. MANN. Of course it does.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean within the department?

Mr. MANN. I think so.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Department of Agriculture publishes a magazine.

Mr. MANN. What kind of a magazine?

Mr. LEVER. The department issues what it calls its Weekly News Letter.

Mr. MANN. That is another proposition entirely. The Interior Department publishes a regular magazine, not just like the Century Magazine, but like many other magazines that are published, and it gives it away to people in the irrigation branch—I suppose those taking up land under the irrigation schemes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Department of Agriculture publishes a Weekly News Letter of the same character.

Mr. MANN. It is a very different thing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should not we apply this limitation to the Department of the Interior?

Mr. MANN. I do not know but that the magazine issued by the Department of the Interior is a very good thing. I do not say that it is not.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman believe that within reasonable bounds a magazine that might be issued by the Agricultural Department, more extensive than that issued in the weekly crop report, might be of great advantage?

Mr. MANN. I think very likely; but no part of the Forest Service appropriation can be used now for the payment of any of these publications, either in the Department of Agriculture or any place else. The Department of Agriculture issues a Weekly News Letter, but if they use any of the Forest Service money in connection with it they are violating the law—if they publish any information that comes from the Forest Service or that is prepared by any official of the Forest Service.

Mr. FOSTER. I am inclined to think it would be a good thing to let them publish one.

Mr. MANN. I remember when the item went in. I think the House was in hysterics at the time.

Mr. FOSTER. I think so, too.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, under general regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the prospecting, development, and utilization of the mineral resources of the lands acquired under the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stats., p. 961), known as the Weeks law, upon such terms and for specified periods, or otherwise, as he may deem to be for the best interests of the United States; and all moneys received on account of charges, if any, made under this act shall be disposed of as is provided by existing law for the disposition of receipts from national forests.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. My particular objection is to the use of the word "Hereafter," making permanent law of it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will withdraw his point of order, I shall ask to strike out the word "Hereafter." This bill passed the House and the Senate. It was put on the bill in the Senate, and it passed both bodies. Both bodies having acted upon it, the committee assumed that it was the wish of Congress that it should become a law, and we undertook to make it a law by the use of this language.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on the strength of the statement of the gentleman that he will strike out the word "Hereafter," I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "Hereafter" at the beginning of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 12, strike out the word "Hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Chemistry: One chemist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,500; 1 executive clerk, $2,120; 2 executive clerks, at $2,000 each; 8 clerks, class 4; 11 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,440; 14 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,300; 42 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,100; 13 clerks, at $1,020 each; 13 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk, $960; 34 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 clerk, $720; 2 food and drug inspectors, at $2,500 each; 2 food and drug inspectors, at $2,250 each; 1 food and drug inspector, $2,120; 11 food and drug inspectors, at $2,000 each; 13 food and drug inspectors, at $1,800 each; 1 food and drug inspector, $1,620; 11 food and drug inspectors, at $1,600 each; 13 food and drug inspectors, at $1,400 each; 1 assistant, $1,600; 4 laboratory helpers, at $1,200 each; 1 laboratory helper, $1,020; 4 laboratory helpers, at $1,000 each; 4 laboratory helpers, at $960 each; 3 laboratory helpers, at $900 each; six laboratory helpers, at $840 each; 2 laboratory helpers, at $780 each; 23 laboratory helpers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $720 each; 2 laboratory helpers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $660 each; 34 laboratory helpers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 laboratory assistant, $1,200; 1 toolmaker, $1,200; two samplers, at $1,200 each; 1 janitor, $1,020; 1 mechanic, $1,400; 1 mechanic, $1,200; 1 mechanic, $1,020; 1 mechanic, $960; 1 mechanic, $900; 2 student assistants, at $300 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,050; 1 skilled laborer, $840; 3 messenger boys or laborers, at $540 each; 12 messenger boys or laborers, at $480 each; 3 messenger boys or laborers, at $420 each; 2 messenger boys or laborers, at $360 each; 9 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $363,110.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the figures "$2,120" at the top of page 45, line 1.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order, and offer the following amendment in lieu of that, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 1, after the word "clerk," insert the figures "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, or misbranded, or poisonous, or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," in the city of Washington and elsewhere, including chemical apparatus, chemicals and supplies, repairs to apparatus, gas, electric current, official traveling expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, and all other expenses, employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as may be considered necessary for the purposes named, and rent outside of the District of Columbia; and to cooperate with associations and scientific societies in the revision of the United States Pharmacopœia and development of methods of analysis, $623,521.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to make an inquiry in reference to the paragraph on page 48, lines 5 to 9:

For the study and improvement of methods of utilizing by-products of citrus fruits; and the investigation and development of methods for determining maturity in fruits and vegetables, in cooperation with the Bureau of Plant Industry and the Bureau of Markets, $13,000.

I am unable to see the correlation between investigating the by-products of citrus fruits and studying the maturity of vegetables.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. In the administration of the law against the misbranding of products it was determined that oranges that had passed through a certain process to give them a yellow appearance were misbranded, and the orange and other fruit growers, in order to avoid a violation of the law intentionally and yet to present their products in good form, have asked the department to determine what is a mature period in the fruit, so that they can sell it as mature fruit without being under penalty for violating that provision of the law.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is all right; but I was trying to find out this, namely: Here is a division of the Department of Agriculture which has grown up under an appropriation of $8,000 to determine methods of utilizing the by-products of citrus fruits. That has no connection whatever, naturally, with determining whether the coloring of citrus fruits is proper or improper, and certainly nothing to do with determining the maturity of vegetables. Why do they pay the same men at work attempting to do these things that are as widely separated as the poles?

Mr. HAWLEY. Probably the same men will not be engaged in the different kinds of work. That arises apparently from the inclusion in one paragraph of two lines of work.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, with one appropriation.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the allowance will be allotted to the two projects and two sets of men will be appointed.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it will be allotted to the two projects or not. The gentleman can only know from the estimates.

Mr. HAWLEY. We can know from the project book.

Mr. MANN. You can know from the project book. It may or may not be carried out. What is the purpose of putting these together when there is no relationship between them?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit——

Mr. MANN. I should say that the maturity of fruits and vegetables would have little to do with the by-products of citrus fruits.

Mr. LEVER. In the citrus industry the department found that there was considerable of a problem as to maturity of fruits. It is possible the men who investigated citrus fruits made that same discovery. It may be that these same men, engaged in the line of work on citrus fruits, would be more competent to consider the maturity of vegetables.

Mr. MANN. They put one man at the head. There is no relationship between them. It looks to me, to speak candidly, like seeking to enlarge the jurisdiction of its work, seeking to grasp some work that does not belong to it, and therefore they have run it under an item to which nobody is opposed for the study of by-products of citrus fruits, and, having the head of the camel in the tent, I think he will carry away the tent.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Illinois has followed this bill so closely and so long that he knows that there are many items grouped together in it that have no relation at all. This bill has grown up—something like Topsy.

Mr. MANN. There is no other place in this bill where you seek to mix water and oil like you do here.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should like to ask the gentleman the meaning of the paragraph on lines 15 and 16, with regard to table sirup?

Mr. LEVER. Two years ago, I believe it was, we authorized an appropriation in the Bureau of Plant Industry to carry on some investigations in the State of Georgia in the matter of manufacturing sirup from cane, and for a study of the sirup after it was manufactured. No study has been made in cooperation with the Bureau of Chemistry. One part of the work is now to be conducted by the Bureau of Plant Industry, but the purely chemical and manufacturing features of the work will be carried on by the Bureau of Chemistry, and the amount charged to the Bureau of Chemistry as we have set it out here.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then this is not a question of the so-called fake sirup? It is a question of a development of the legitimate production of sirup?

Mr. LEVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. I notice there was an item for the purchase and equipment of a traveling laboratory. Was such a laboratory constructed?

Mr. LEVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. And if so, is it appropriated for in this bill this year?

Mr. LEVER. No, sir; it is not. They completed the laboratory.

Mr. TILSON. That is one item that has been extended and has not produced a continuing expense?

Mr. COX. There are two—namely, logged-off land and wild ducks.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina what a traveling laboratory is for? How is it used?

Mr. LEVER. This laboratory was requested by the Department of Agriculture in administering some of the work it was doing on the road. Just the details of that, I will say frankly to the gentleman, have passed out of my mind. I can refresh my memory on it, however.

Mr. CANNON. I can see how it could be very useful in a dry State. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF SOILS.

Salaries, Bureau of Soils: One soil physicist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,120; 1 executive assistant, $2,000; 4 clerks, class 4; 2 clerks, class 3; 5 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,260; 8 clerks, class 1; 5 clerks, at $1,000 each; 5 clerks, at $900 each; 1 soil cartographer, $1,800; 1 chief draftsman, $1,600; 1 soil bibliographer or draftsman, $1,400; 1 photographer, $1,200; 5 draftsmen, at $1,200 each; 1 clerk-draftsman, $1,200; 2 draftsmen, at $1,000 each; 1 laboratory helper, $1,000; 3 laboratory helpers, at $840 each; 1 machinist, $1,380; 1 instrument maker, $1,200; 1 machinist's helper, $900; 1 messenger, $840; 3 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 2 laborers, at $600 each; 1 laborer, $300; 1 charwoman or laborer, $480; in all, $72,340.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the increase of $2,120 at the end of line 19, page 49.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, line 19, after the word "clerk," insert the figures "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the appropriation of $175,000 made by the Agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917 for the investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale, including the establishment and equipment of such plant or plants as may be necessary therefor, as remains unexpended, is hereby reappropriated and made available until expended for the purposes named.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph beginning on line 21, page 51, relating to potash. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina something of just what has been done out in California with reference to the building of this plant and what remains unexpended, and how it is to be used in the next year?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that practically none of this amount of $175,000 has been expended. The Secretary of Agriculture sent one of his experts to the Pacific coast some time just before we had hearings on this item, and this young man reported back to him that he did not believe that he could induce the private individuals who were going into the manufacture of potash for ammunition purposes out there to become very much interested in it, and brought back to the Secretary a rather discouraging report. The expert, however, was not discouraged. The Secretary himself was not entirely discouraged. In a later interview with another party, who has a concern in operation out there, the expert of the department convinced this gentleman that, by the installing of proper machinery and by the reduction of waste, and by the utilization of the by-products of potash, such as iodine and other things, a profit could be made from the manufacture of potash out of the giant kelp under normal conditions, conditions such as existed before the outbreak of the European war.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I read this report. I am not sure that my recollection is fresh. My recollection is that there are several plants out there now making potash from kelp at a large profit, owing to the unusual price of potash during the continuance of the European war. But they were afraid that they would not continue to make the potash after the war was over for fear that they could not make it at a profit.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's recollection, as usual, is correct. They are manufacturing potash out there now with almost no regard for the cost of manufacture, because of the enormous profit in it caused by these war prices. But what we are driving at here, and what we are investigating, is whether or not there is a possibility of manufacturing potash out of kelp to be used as fertilizer in competition with German potash.

The Secretary of Agriculture did not feel that with the information which he had at the time of making these estimates, or even at the time of the hearings on this bill, he was justified in spending very much of this money in the way of erecting a plant. He desires further time to look into the situation, and, therefore, he asks for the reappropriation of the funds provided for in the bill last year.

Mr. MANN. These people who are making potash there now, several of them, are making a profit without probably a too fine regard for the cost of production; but they are just as anxious to make more profit as anybody else. Is not the gentleman from South Carolina inclined to believe that with their experience, when the price of potash goes down, and maybe before, they will know as much about it as somebody who has never manufactured it can tell them, and that they will endeavor to save by means of the utilization of the by-products, which now they do not save?

Mr. LEVER. That is probably true; and yet I do not think it would justify us in disallowing a continuance of this appropriation, because the Secretary has certainly acted in the utmost good faith with Congress on the proposition; else it might have been wasted. Instead of doing that, he has spent practically none of it, except incidentally for traveling expenses.

Mr. MANN. He has not spent any of it, because it was not necessary. Owing to the high price of potash, they have established these plants there and are manufacturing potash out of kelp, and they have made a profit on it. They have got the plants. It was not necessary for the Government to establish a plant to ascertain if potash could be made out of kelp, because these people are doing it. Now, if they do not succeed when the war is over and the price of potash goes down, will it not be time enough then to embark on these experiments, and in the meantime save money by discontinuing the building of plants in competition with them?

Mr. LEVER. The potash situation in this country is so acute, and has been since the outbreak of the war in Europe, that it presses very strongly on us—on the minds of those who know this situation—the absolute necessity of this Government going to extremes in order to make itself self-sustaining in the manufacture of potash.

Mr. MANN. The effect of this will not be felt until the war is over, and the price of potash is reduced. Of course, when the price of potash is reduced we will have an ample supply.

Mr. LEVER. We ought to take advantage of the situation now, when we are cut off from potash abroad and people are suffering from the lack of it. We ought to take advantage of the situation now to engage every energy in an effort to relieve that situation. I do not believe that a great country like this, so dependent in many sections upon potash for the growing of crops, ought to be dependent on a foreign nation for such a fertilizer.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will do me the credit of admitting that I was the first one to make the proposition that the Government ought to find potash and I have been in favor of it all through.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. MANN. What occurs to me is that with plants actually in operation they will learn more about it than the Government officials, and it is not necessary when you have plants in actual operation for the Government to construct another plant in order to find out something about it.

Mr. LEVER. The Secretary of Agriculture has taken almost the gentleman's own position in this matter. He was authorized to construct a plant at a cost of $175,000. He has been making an effort during the six months that have passed since this appropriation was available to form a cooperative arrangement with the plants out there to do this work. The fact has been that those gentlemen, with their enormous profits, are doing business in such an extravagant way that the facts and figures which would be developed through any cooperative arrangement that might be made with them would not really be the true facts. In other words, these folks are drunk with their own wealth, as it were, and are spending money like hot cakes, counting very little the cost of production. That is the situation as it comes to the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree entirely with the gentleman that almost any amount of money that this Government could expend for this purpose, for the purpose of developing a self-sustaining potash industry in this country, would be money well spent.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman has been very active in that direction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I very much hope that all points of order will be withdrawn in this case, because I believe what the gentleman says is true, and with the present price of potash, which I believe is about 10 times the normal, the present plants are working at a very extravagant rate, in a way not utilizing the by-products as an intelligent effort on the part of the Government might show they could be used. And, furthermore, I understand that in Japan there are at least 50 plants in operation, and that they are producing potash at a cost which would give a profit, even under the old price of potash, by the proper utilization of their by-products. That was my information last year on the Pacific coast.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is correct about that; but there are many other matters to take into consideration when we are increasing the supply of potash by other methods.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I was referring to the production of potash entirely from kelp, and that is the object of this plant.

Mr. FOSTER. They get it from the kelp in Japan.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But I understand that the supply of kelp on the Pacific coast runs from San Diego up to Alaska. I have seen it at San Diego, and there is relatively a smaller supply on the Japanese coast, and those two coasts are the only ones in the world where there is any of this giant kelp from which potash is produced. The supply lying there at our doors is more than enough to supply all the potash that is used in the United States, if a merchantable way of producing it can be found. The purpose of this is to ascertain such methods, as I understand.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true, and I can say to the gentleman from Illinois that I believe he can, with the utmost confidence, trust the Secretary of Agriculture not to misuse this fund.

Mr. FOSTER. The purpose for which I reserved the point of order was to find out what had been done in reference to this matter in the last year.

Mr. LEVER. Very little has been done, except that the Secretary has been looking into the situation carefully.

Mr. FOSTER. On the statement of the gentleman I am going to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order. I fully agree with the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this is no time to make experiments. Therefore I make the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold it to allow the gentleman from California to make a statement.

Mr. RANDALL. It so happens that the potash industry is centered in the city of Long Beach, Cal., and is absolutely in an experimental stage. There are a number of factories in Long Beach which are simply experimenting, and not making enormous profits, as the chairman of the committee has stated.

That is my understanding. These factories are not making any considerable profit, and are simply in the experimental stage. There may be a few of them that are making a little bit of money, but it is not understood that that applies to them generally.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say they are not making a profit?

Mr. RANDALL. They may be making a little profit on a small scale. They are in the experimental stage.

Mr. MANN. The inspector who was sent out there said they were making very large profits.

Mr. RANDALL. Relatively they may be, but the business is being carried on there on a very small scale.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much capital is invested? How many plants are engaged in the manufacture?

Mr. RANDALL. I can not state that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Generally speaking, the gentleman says they are in the experimental stage. Does it require a large investment of capital to conduct these operations on an experimental scale?

Mr. RANDALL. I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that if private capital is experimenting in the development of the potash industry, it will be just as alert in trying to find out economic methods of manufacture as a Government expert who has no practical knowledge?

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no; the Government is much better equipped for the work of experimentation.

[Mr. KINKAID addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have been here since 11 o'clock hard at work. It is now nearly half-past 5. We have made rapid progress on the bill, and I suggest that the gentleman from South Carolina move that the committee rise. There is another inducement for me to make the suggestion to the gentleman, because in 1875, on the 5th day of January, was born one of the ablest, strongest, and best-beloved Members in this House, and this is the anniversary of his birth. I refer to the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. LEVER, and I think he is entitled to quit. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois, although I would like to have the point of order disposed of. But I will move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19359, the Agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for two days, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I understand that to-morrow is Saturday, and if we meet at 11 a. m. we will adjourn early, in accordance with that southern custom of not working on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. LEVER. I think we can finish the bill to-morrow, and I am willing to adjourn as soon as the bill is finished.

ADJOURNMENT.

And then, on motion of Mr. LEVER (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 6, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Playa del Rey Inlet and Basin, Venice, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 1880); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Machias River, Me. (H. Doc. No. 1881); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copy of the proceedings of a board of officers convened in accordance with the authority of the national-defense act, approved June 3, 1916, to investigate and report upon the feasibility, desirability, and practicability of the Government manufacturing arms, munitions, and equipment and certain other allied questions (S. Doc. No. 664); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Licking River, Ky., for a distance of about 10 miles from its mouth (H. Doc. No. 1882); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting tentative draft of an additional proviso to supplement the item, "Arming, equipping, and training the National Guard," page 347, Book of Estimates, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1883); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Jacob Sheek v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1884); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and a resolution were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 323) to amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," approved July 20, 1916, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1251), which said bill and joint resolution were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEELE of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1252), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KAHN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19423) granting to the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, a right of way for a storm-water relief sewer through a portion of the Presidio of San Francisco Military Reservation, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1253), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 6, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in the ever present duties of life we feel that we must always call upon the divine guidance and blessing, for human strength and wisdom have never been sufficient for human life. We have our life not only set in this world's circumstance but also projected into the eternal and changeless. The influence of our lives must go out and touch the life of those about us, not only for time but for eternity. So we pray that Thou wilt give us wisdom for the duties of this day, that Thou wilt give us grace and piety for walk with God in all the duties of life, that we may stand at last approved in Thy presence. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Phelan	Sterling
Bankhead	Hughes	Pittman	Stone
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Thomas
Brady	Jones	Ransdell	Thompson
Brandegee	Kenyon	Reed	Tillman
Bryan	Kirby	Robinson	Townsend
Clapp	Lane	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Clark	McCumber	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Culberson	McLean	Sheppard	Walsh
Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Watson
Dillingham	Nelson	Shields	Works
Fletcher	Norris	Simmons
Gallinger	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Harding	Page	Smoot

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] through illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day. The senior Senator from Kentucky has a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. LANE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the previous day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, January 4, 1917, when, on request of Mr. OVERMAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

FLOOD CONTROL.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, on December 22 I reported from the Committee on Commerce for the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] the bill (H. R. 14777) to provide for the control of floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Cal., and for other purposes. The report of the committee was signed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and by order of the committee the report was to be made by me for him, as he was then confined at his hotel on account of indisposition. The RECORD shows that I made the report for the Senator from Louisiana, but I see that my name appears in the caption and upon the calendar. I ask permission that it be changed so that the RECORD may show that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] made the report, and that he is in fact in charge of what is known as the flood-control bill. I make this correction because I feel that the Senator is entitled to it, and it was an oversight on the part of the clerks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Mississippi will be granted.

SENATOR FROM WYOMING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the credentials of JOHN B. KENDRICK, chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Wyoming a Senator to represent that State, which will be printed in the RECORD and placed on the files of the Senate.

The credentials are as follows:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, CHEYENNE.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1916, JOHN B. KENDRICK was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Wyoming a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1917.

Witness: His excellency our governor, JOHN B. KENDRICK, and our seal hereto affixed at Cheyenne this 23d day of December, in the year of our Lord 1916.

[SEAL.] JOHN B. KENDRICK, Governor.

By the governor:

FRANK L. HOUX, Secretary of State.
By F. H. WESTCOTT, Deputy.

SENATOR FROM TEXAS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have the honor to present the credentials of my colleague the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] for the succeeding term in the Senate. I ask that the credentials be read and properly filed.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows:

CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION.

THE STATE OF TEXAS.

This is to certify that at a general election held in the State of Texas on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, A. D. 1916, being the 7th day of said month, CHARLES A. CULBERSON having received the highest number of votes cast for any person at said election for the office hereinafter named, was duly elected as United States Senator for the State of Texas.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and caused the seal of State to be affixed at the city of Austin, on this 18th day of December, A. D. 1916.

[SEAL.] JAMES E. FERGUSON, Governor.

By the governor:

JOHN G. MCKAY, Secretary of State.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on Monday, December 18, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] presented the credentials of CHARLES E. TOWNSEND for the term beginning March 4, 1917, which were read and ordered to be placed on file.

The form of these credentials seems, upon examination, to be imperfect, and on January 2 credentials in the usual form suggested by the resolution of the Senate of August 24, 1914, were handed down by the President pro tempore, which I ask may be placed on the files and recorded by the Secretary under the rule in lieu of those first presented.

I will say that the first credentials were not signed by the governor, and to that extent were imperfect. The second set which came in are in due form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second set were filed by order of the Senate, and they will be printed in the RECORD.

The credentials are as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN, EXECUTIVE OFFICE, LANSING.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1916, CHARLES E. TOWNSEND was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Michigan a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1917.

Witness: His excellency, our governor, Woodbridge N. Ferris, and our seal hereto affixed at Lansing this 22d day of December, in the year of our Lord 1916.

[SEAL.] WOODBRIDGE N. FERRIS, Governor.

By the governor:

COLEMAN C. VAUGHAN,
Secretary of State.
By GEORGE L. LUSK,
Deputy Secretary of State.

SENATOR FROM NEVADA.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I present the credentials of my colleague, Hon. KEY PITTMAN, which I ask may be read and placed on the files of the Senate.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows:

STATE OF NEVADA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Whereas at the general election held in the State of Nevada on the 7th day of November, 1916, KEY PITTMAN was duly elected to the office of United States Senator for the term of six years from and after March 4, 1917, and until his successor is elected and qualified. Now, therefore, Emmet D. Boyle, governor of the State of Nevada, by the authority in me vested by the constitution and laws thereof do hereby commission him, the said KEY PITTMAN, of the State of Nevada, and authorize him to discharge the duties of said office according to law and to hold and enjoy the same, together with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments thereunto appertaining for the term as aforesaid.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of State to be affixed at Carson City this 28th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1916.

[SEAL.] EMMET D. BOYLE,
Governor of the State of Nevada.

By the governor:

GEORGE BRODIGAN,
Secretary of State.
By J. W. LEGATE,
Deputy.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY (H. DOC. NO. 1887).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing the names of all persons employed in the Bureau of Animal Industry during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1916, except those whose salaries were paid exclusively from the meat-inspection appropriation, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of William H. Cox in behalf of the Pokogan Tribe of Pottowatomie Indians, remonstrating against the conversion of lake lands in the northern part of Indiana into a national park, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of General Henry W. Lawton Camp, No. 4, United Spanish War Veterans, of the District of Columbia, and a petition of the Council of the Order of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to protect the flag of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENYON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Iowa, praying that the surplus money received from naturalization sources may be used for the education of immigrants, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society of the Randle Highlands Baptist Church; of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Societies and the Woman's Home Missionary Societies of the Methodist Episcopal Churches of the District of Columbia; of the Vaughan Bible Class of the Calvary Baptist Church; of the Third Quarterly Conference of the Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church (colored); and of the congregation of the Douglass Memorial Episcopal Church, all in the District of Columbia, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Pacific Press Publishing Association, of Mountain View, Cal., remonstrating against proposed changes in zone postal rates, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HARDING presented a petition of sundry citizens of Dayton, Ohio, praying for the establishment of a national leprosarium, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Columbus, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to exclude liquor advertisements from the mails, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LANE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oregon, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a memorial of the president of the Porto Rico Federation of Labor, making certain representations on the pending Porto Rican government bill. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 4, 1916.

STATEMENT BY SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, PRESIDENT OF PORTO RICO FEDERATION OF LABOR, ON PORTO RICO BILL.

[This statement in full was handed to President Wilson by President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, at the White House, Dec. 4, 1916.]

I now want to make particular reference to the constant failure of Congress during the last few years to enact a law as to the status of the people of Porto Rico. There is now pending before the Senate a bill which, if it becomes law, certainly will define forever the status of the people of Porto Rico. The bill contains several clauses of a reactionary character, against which the Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico emphatically protest.

Before entering into the presentation of the features of the bill to which the labor people as well as the people in general of Porto Rico protest, let me quote the Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH, chairman of the committee of the Senate on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, in an address to the Senate:

"Mr. President, in the formation of our Republic we put forth to the world new principles of government which seemed so plain to us that we declared them to be self-evident truths. We declared that all men are created equal, not in intellect, not in height, not in strength, not in color, and not in many other respects, but equal in rights. We declared that man is entitled, as an unalienable right, to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We said in that declaration that so sacred are these rights against tyranny that they not only shall not be invaded by others but they can not be bartered away even by ourselves."

The working people of Porto Rico wonder why Senator SHAFROTH has not followed the splendid policy he outlined in the framing of the Porto Rican bill.

Section 26 of the Jones bill, with amendments by the Senate committee, of which Senator SHAFROTH is chairman, says:

"No person shall be a member of the Senate of Porto Rico who does not own taxable property in Porto Rico to the value of not less than $1,000."

Section 27 of the same bill says:

"No person shall be a member of the house of representatives who does not own and pay taxes upon property of the assessed value of not less than $500."

The only argument which Gov. Yager advanced in advocating the property and the literacy qualifications is that he has proof that the corporations practically control the votes of large groups of working people.

The labor movement of Porto Rico, as expressed through the Free Federation of Workingmen, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, has been and is now the most potential and influential factor in the island to Americanize the people of Porto Rico to the American standard of political action and freedom, and it has succeeded in a great measure in freeing them from the influence of the employers politically as well as economically. It is a dangerous proposition at this time to impose a property qualification on members to be elected for the Senate as well as for the House of Representatives of Porto Rico. To give to only those with property qualification the right to control the affairs of the people of the island will have a tendency to strengthen and encourage the agitation and propaganda of those who are already preaching anti-American sentiments and striving for the independence of the island.

Section 35 of the same bill states:

"That no person shall be allowed to register as a voter or to vote in Porto Rico unless he is able to read and write or he is a bona fide taxpayer."

This has been amended by adding these words:

"That all legally qualified electors of Porto Rico at the last election shall be entitled to register and vote at elections for 10 years from and after the passage of this act."

If Congress enacts the bill containing the clause quoted, it will disfranchise three out of every four voters of Porto Rico—the provision will practically disfranchise 175,000 workingmen out of a total of 205,000 voters of the whole island. The adoption of that clause would be a great political mistake and a national wrong imposed upon the people of the island.

The people of Porto Rico exercised the franchise for the last 16 years, and even under the Spanish monarchy. Such rights were accorded to our people by the Cortes of Spain and our local legislature, and now the Congress of the United States is being advised to take away those rights that our people enjoy and possess. It is indeed a very serious question; that the same bill which purports to grant American citizenship to the people of Porto Rico shall take away the civil rights that our people enjoy and possess, so it will clearly appear to the minds of the people that in being honorably granted citizenship of the United States they are going to lose their civil rights, and a property qualification is to be required for those who make the laws and rule the working people, who constitute ninety-odd per cent of the people of the island.

On the other hand, no means are provided to enable some 300,000 children to attend schools, which amounts to 60 per cent of the total electoral population, who, because of the inability to obtain an education, will be deprived of the right of franchise. Moreover, under the proposed law only such citizens as pay a tax will be privileged to be representatives in the legislature of the island. Workingmen, however bright and intelligent they may be, if they pay no taxes will be disqualified and robbed of the right to be representatives.

Recently Gov. Yager, of Porto Rico, was quoted by the press as saying that it is absolutely necessary that the Jones bill be passed in Congress before the holiday recess, in order to check forever the anti-American and independence agitation in the island.

Recently, in a conversation with Gen. Frank McIntyre, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs in the War Department, I tried to convey to him the influences, ideas, and political conditions that now exist in Porto Rico, and he made the following remark, referring specially to that section of the bill relative to the civil rights of Porto Rico: "Those clauses are not essential to the principles of the bill and could very well be eliminated." While the Jones bill grants to the people of Porto Rico American citizenship, that same bill forces upon our people theories of government which have long ago been repudiated by the progressive force of American democracy as well as the progressive force of Porto Rico.

If the condition of the people of Porto Rico is ever to be raised to a standard at all compatible with that prevailing in the United States, the civil and political rights that we now enjoy and possess must be guaranteed and extended in the new organic law now pending before the Senate.

The Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico maintains fully the same declarations and petitions duly made to the President of the United States in Congress year after year.

The people of the island want to solve a great economic problem by the right guaranteed by the new constitution to use the Government, whose upholders they are, to obtain loans at a low rate of interest, the Government in making such loans do away with the dreadful usury prevailing through the country. In so doing the Government would also hamper and lessen the social and industrial oppression of the masses and help thereby in diffusing the wealth.

The banking system and the credit have both been left in the hands of private manipulation. Both speculation and monopoly, as well as the control of the local government, has fallen into the hands of the most powerful corporations.

The private monopoly of vital interests of the community of the island is detrimental to the well-being of the people, and such monopoly and control of the wealth produced by the people are creating among the popular minds a moral state of indignation against the hateful industrial oppression which has been the cause of so much wretchedness, privation, and hunger among the working masses.

We hope the United States Congress will enact a constitution furthering the common good of all the people of Porto Rico and in the general interest of the island relieving the masses of the social and industrial oppression they suffer—oppression which is casting discredit upon the American flag. Congress should suppress the monopoly effected by the corporations; the exportation of wealth produced by Porto Rican workers should be regulated so as to retain the great part for the benefit of the inhabitants of the island. Now, more than 60 per cent is exported, a circumstance which turns the island into a trading post operated by underfed and barefoot laborers, and in this way the constitution would benefit the whole people and not a specially privileged class or party. Such a measure would promote the diffusion of wealth and comfort, intelligence, virtue, and equal opportunity, which are the chief aims and aspirations of the wise, democratic American institutions.

EXTRACT FROM H. R. 9533—AMENDMENTS.

Page 23, section 26, lines 10 to 13, strike out the words "and who does not own in his individual right taxable property in Porto Rico to the value of not less than $1,000 assessed in his name and upon which he pays taxes."

Page 24, section 27, lines 7 to 10, strike out the words "and who does not own in his individual right taxable and pays taxes upon property, real or personal, situated in Porto Rico, of the assessed value of not less than $500."

That section 35 be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 35. That at the first election held pursuant to this act, the qualified electors shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law; thereafter voters for all offices elected by the people shall have the qualifications prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico and be comprised within one of the following classes:

"(a) Those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage.

"(b) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English.

"(c) Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum."

GOVERNMENT EXHIBIT IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, from the Committee on Industrial Expositions, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 182) inviting the people of the United States to visit the District of Columbia during the week of February 26 to March 4, 1917, to view the Capitol and inspect an exhibition of the various activities of the Government service, reported it without amendment.

MAHONING RIVER BRIDGE, OHIO.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I report back from the Committee on Commerce favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 7556) to grant to the Mahoning & Shenango Railway & Light Co., its successors and assigns, the right to construct, complete, maintain, and operate a combination dam and bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River, near the borough of Lowellville, in the county of Mahoning and State of Ohio. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 7710) to amend the irrigation act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., 1095), section 18, and to amend section 2 of the act of May 11, 1898 (30 Stat., 404); to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

A bill (S. 7722) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916;

A bill (S. 7723) to amend section 1496 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to the examination of officers of the Navy for promotion; and

A bill (S. 7724) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 7725) granting an increase of pension to Martha R. Griswold (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 7726) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BRADY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for repairing and completing the wasteways of the canal system on the lands owned by the white men on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, Idaho, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 18453), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 to equip and maintain a United States sheep experiment station in Fremont County, Idaho, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 19359), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the secretary to the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia from $2,400 to $3,000, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19119), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $36,000 for the purchase of lot 61 in square 555, in the District of Columbia, for a playground site, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19119), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the purchase and installation of 100 bulletin boards constructed in accordance with United States letters patent No. 1206148, to be placed in such post offices as the Civil Service Commission may deem most advisable, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 18542), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MIDWINTER CARNIVAL—ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. CLAPP. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 191) authorizing the Postmaster General to provide the postmaster at St. Paul, Minn., with a special canceling die for the winter sports carnival of that city, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the city of St. Paul, Minn., is making extensive preparations for the second annual midwinter carnival to be held in said city from January 27 to February 3, 1917; and

Whereas the projected celebration by said city, in connection with said carnival, will include pageants, national athletic games, tournaments, parades, and many other midwinter demonstrations, that will attract visitors from all parts of the United States; and

Whereas the citizens' committee having the celebration in charge have widely advertised the approaching event, with the result that a great increase of incoming and outgoing mail matter is now being handled by the St. Paul, Minn., post office: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to prepare and deliver to the postmaster at St. Paul, Minn., a special canceling device to be used in the cancellation of mail matter in the post office of that city from and after the passage of this joint resolution up to and including February 15, 1917, said die to be of such design as may be agreed upon by the Postmaster General and the citizens' committee of St. Paul, Minn.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. A similar joint resolution has been introduced in the House of Representatives, and it is necessary to have legislation passed at an early day in order to secure the canceling die to be used in connection with the winter sports carnival, which is to be held at St. Paul, Minn., January 27 to February 3 of this year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINING ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, some days ago I rose and attempted to secure recognition for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the consideration and passage of the bill (H. R. 12426) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations. I do not wish in the morning hour to bring up any bill which will lead to long discussion, but I desire to say that this bill, which has, of course, passed the other House, has been reported favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate. It proposes to extend the right to Indians and other persons to locate, prospect, and to mine for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations in accordance with regulations issued by the Interior Department. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate advert to this bill, because I think it can be passed in a few moments. I should like to have the bill read.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to that until the morning business is concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further bills or joint resolutions? [A pause.] Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry. During the legislative day of yesterday I gave notice of an amendment which I intend to propose to the standing rules of the Senate. As I understand, I can call that up during the morning hour any day that I desire to do so. I want to ask the Chair if that is correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That matter went over under the rule, and would naturally come under the next order of business, the Chair would think, as being a resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. JONES. It is not a resolution, I will say to the Chair, but simply the notice required by the rules that on a subsequent day I should offer an amendment to the rules. As I understand, pursuant to that notice, I can offer such amendment any day that I see fit when I can obtain recognition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that statement of the Senator, the Chair understands that is the correct construction.

Mr. JONES. I will say that I do not intend to present the matter to-day, but shall do so possibly some time early next week.

REPUBLIC OF CUBA V. STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there concurrent or other resolutions. If there be none, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 300), as follows:

Whereas the Republic of Cuba moved in the Supreme Court of the United States to be permitted to institute an action of debt against the State of North Carolina upon certain bonds purporting to be issued by the said State of North Carolina in the years 1868 and 1869, which said bonds are particularly described in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba filed with its motion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the United States is directed to use his offices with the Republic of Cuba to ascertain when and under what circumstances the Republic of Cuba acquired these bonds; and from whom it acquired them; and for what purpose it holds them; and what price, if any, it paid for said bonds; and if the Republic of Cuba has moved to institute suit against the State of North Carolina in behalf of itself or in behalf of others who may own said bonds; and to communicate said information to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that resolution, which comes over from a previous day, and which was introduced by me, asks for certain information in regard to a suit brought against the State of North Carolina by the Republic of Cuba. I am going to move to indefinitely postpone the resolution, because the resolution and the debate that occurred upon it on this floor have had the effect that I intended, for I now have all the information which I desired furnished me by the Republic of Cuba.

Furthermore, I am glad to state to the Senate that Cuba, our sister Republic, has very graciously and most cordially revoked this decree and has ordered that the suit against the State of North Carolina for $2,000,000 be withdrawn.

Mr. President, our sister Republic is very indignant that she should have been imposed upon by these creditors. It has been a "frame-up." I want to commend his excellency, the Cuban minister, for the very gracious and friendly spirit in which he has handled the matter. A few hours after he read the debate in the RECORD—and it seems that all of the ministers and ambassadors from foreign countries read the RECORD every morning—he transmitted to his country the substance of the debate and the resolution. In consequence of his having done so, Cuba has taken this action.

I now desire to put into the RECORD a communication I have in regard to the matter, including a copy of the decree made by Cuba, and also stating the facts and circumstances upon which these bonds were received.

It seems, Mr. President, that there is in this country a committee that holds the repudiated bonds on which they have made these "frame-ups," or tried to make "frame-ups," in order to get some State or foreign country to pull these chestnuts out of the fire, either by misrepresentation or withholding the facts in regard to these bonds. They have succeeded in one State, but many of the States have spurned them since they have become acquainted with the facts. Of course, the Republic of Cuba knew nothing of the character of these bonds. They were donated to a charitable institution, which accepted them, thinking the bonds were good. As a consequence a decree was entered ordering the attorney general of Cuba—I do not know his name; I can not call his name—together with a man by the name of Burnstine, who represented these bondholders, to bring suit against North Carolina in the Supreme Court of the United States. That suit was set for a hearing upon the question of jurisdiction on Monday next. So, our sister Republic, since informed of the character of these bonds, has acted very quickly to settle this matter and wishes to express her indignation at the way in which she has been treated.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that the letter which I hold in my hand containing the facts be printed in the RECORD, without reading. They are very interesting, and I hope Senators will read them; but I am not going to delay the Senate by asking to have them read from the desk. I also ask that there be printed in the RECORD an extract from an opinion of Chief Justice White in the celebrated case of South Dakota against North Carolina, giving merely one extract from his opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 6, 1917.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the petition filed in the Supreme Court of the United States, on behalf of the Republic of Cuba, to bring suit against the State of North Carolina on certain unpaid bonds of that State, I can now, from information received from authoritative sources, communicate the following facts:

Some time last summer an attorney, a resident of New York, proffered, on behalf of the "Bondholders defaulted committee," to the Cuban Beneficencia, an endowed charity corporation controlled by a board under the general supervision of the Government, 795 North Carolina bonds of several railroad construction issues. This donation seems to have been accepted without any thorough understanding on the part of the donee corporation or the officials representing it of the nature of the bonds, of the conditions under which they were issued, or of the facts connected with the State's disavowal thereof.

Through some means—the details of which we have not been able to exactly ascertain—a decree was entered on July 24, 1916, but not published until November 16, 1916, and signed by the President of Cuba, authorizing the institution of a suit in the Supreme Court of the United States through two attorneys named in the decree, and providing that the Department of Justice could make an agreement regarding their compensation.

I am authoritatively informed that the State Department of Cuba knew nothing of this matter until after entry of the decree and the filing of the petition in the Supreme Court of the United States, and that the President of Cuba had not been personally informed of the nature of the decree until after that event. A copy of the decree authorizing the suit is hereto annexed and, as you will observe, it provides for the appointment of attorneys, one of whom is an American citizen and one a Cuban, and gives the Department of Justice power to fix their compensation.

During the past two weeks there has been considerable correspondence by cable between the Cuban authorities in Havana and the legation at Washington in regard to the matter; and now that the matter has been fully explained to the home authorities in Cuba, the Minister of Cuba to the United States, who has taken a deep and friendly interest in the matter toward the United States, is now authorized to make public the fact that the President of the Republic of Cuba, on January 4, 1917, dictated a decree, the most important part of which,

and which relates to the petition filed in the Supreme Court, is as follows:

"Whereas the necessary claim for the payment of said bonds and coupons has been presented to the Supreme Court of the United States;

"Whereas by the terms in which the question is presented the Government does not hold convenient to its interests and ends to continue the suit begun against the State of North Carolina for the payment of said bonds and coupons:

"At the proposal of the secretary of justice, I resolve to revoke and leave without force the decree No. 1438, of July 24, 1916, and therefore, without effect the appointment therein made, as attorneys of Messrs. Marcus H. Burnstine and Guillermo Portela y Moller, to whom this shall be made known, to the proper objects and consequences."

The minister of Cuba to the United States has also been authorized to state that the claim on these bonds was made only by the department of public health and charities of Cuba, although, according to law, the President of the Republic and the secretary of justice were called upon to give the powers of attorney for the presentation of the claim.

I understand that this information is about to be officially transmitted by the Cuban minister to the Secretary of State, and through the latter to the Department of Justice, so that the position of Cuba in this matter can be properly presented to the Supreme Court of the United States.

As you will remember, the Supreme Court of the United States, on receiving the petition of Mr. Burnstine on behalf of the Republic of Cuba, ordered a copy of the papers sent to the Attorney General of the United States, and I believe that the Solicitor General intends to present in proper legal form to the Supreme Court on Monday, January 8, when the rule on the petition for leave to file is returnable, the facts which I now communicate to you, and which will demonstrate to the court that by reason of the revocation of the decree on which the suit is based no further action can be taken in the matter.

With highest expressions of esteem, believe me, my dear Senator OVERMAN, to be

Yours, very sincerely,

CHAS. HENRY BUTLER,
Of Counsel for the State of North Carolina.

DECREE NO. 1438.

[Translated from the Gaceta Oficial of Nov. 16, 1916.]

Whereas it appears from an inquiry instituted in the department of health and charities at the behest of Sr. Guillermo Portela that the Bondholders' Defaulted Committee have donated to the Beneficencia de Cuba 795 bonds and coupons pertaining to the following issues of the State of North Carolina, United States: Western North Carolina Railroad Co., issue of April 1, 1869; Wilmington, Charlotte & Rutherford Railroad Co., issue of April 1, 1879; Williamston & Tarbor Railroad Co., issue of October 1, 1868; Western Railroad Co., issue of April 1, 1869; and Western North Carolina Railroad Co., issue of October 1, 1868;

Whereas to recover the amount represented by said bonds and their coupons it might be necessary to bring in the courts of the United States and before other competent authorities judicial suits or claims of other kind;

Whereas according to article 7 of the Instruccion de Beneficencia (charity regulations) of April 27, 1875, in connection with article 324 of the Law of the Executive Power, it is incumbent upon the Government of the Republic to represent and protect all charitable institutions of a general character;

Whereas, according to article 103 of the Laws of the Executive Power, it is the duty of the secretary of justice to take appropriate steps to cause the proper application of property of all kinds devoted to public charity establishments or foundations, when so requested by the cabinet officer having jurisdiction in such matters, while in the present case the secretary of health and charities has requested this decree of the secretary of justice;

Whereas the secretary of justice may, under the provisions of article 110 of the Law of the Executive Power, utilize in the service of the Republic the lawyers whom he shall deem necessary and appropriate, stipulating with them the compensation which they shall receive:

I hereby resolve—

First. That the sum to which the bonds and their coupons of the aforesaid issues amount be collected, bringing therefor all judicial and extrajudicial claims which may be necessary until that purpose is accomplished.

Second. That the secretary of justice designate Messrs. Marcus H. Burnstine and Guillermo Portela y Moller, lawyers, to exercise in the courts of the United States, including the Supreme Court of the United States, on behalf of the Government of Cuba in its exercise of the protectorate of public charities, all actions which might appertain to the Government of Cuba in order to obtain the payment of the amount represented by said bonds and their coupons, with authority likewise to conduct with competent administrative authorities any and all negotiations which might be helpful, appropriate, or necessary for the collection of said amount, and with authority in any case to compromise the claims of the Republic, first consulting the secretary of health and charities.

Third. The secretary of justice and the secretary of health are hereby charged with the fulfillment of this decree.

Given in "Duranona," Mariano, the 24th day of July, 1916.

M. G. MENOCAL, President.
C. DE LA GUARDIA,
Secretary of Justice.

[Extract from dissenting opinion of Justice, now Chief Justice, White in South Dakota against North Carolina (192 U. S., 286, pp. 349–350).]

Third. Finally, putting out of view the various considerations which I have previously stated, in my opinion this record discloses a condition of things which ought to prevent a court of equity from exerting its powers to enforce for the benefit of the State of South Dakota the claim which it asserts against the State of North Carolina. From the facts which I have at the outset recited it is undeniable that at the time the gift was made to the State of South Dakota of the bonds in question they were past due, and payment thereof had been more than 20 years prior to the gift refused by the State of North Carolina. The letter evidencing the gift demonstrates that the purpose of the gift to the State of South Dakota was to enable that State to assert a cause of action against the State of North Carolina which did not exist in favor of the transferrer. It also appears by the act of the Legislature of South Dakota, under which this suit was brought, that the State of South Dakota deemed that it might acquire a mere right to litigate, since the act itself in advance provided that the attorney general of the State should prosecute actions in the name of the State to recover on bonds or choses in action which might be transferred to the State, and that it contemplated litigation without cost to itself, since the act empowered the attorney general to employ counsel to prosecute suits, the compensation to be paid out of the proceeds which might be realized. This condition of things, in my opinion, although it may not be champertous in the strict sense of that word, is in its nature equivalent to a champertous engagement, whose enforcement is contrary to public policy, and one which a court therefore ought not to lend its aid to carry into effect. It has been sometimes said that the doctrine of maintenance and champerty has no application to the sovereign. But this can alone be justified by taking into view the high attributes which pertain to sovereignty. Now, if the State of South Dakota may avail of the delegation of judicial power over controversies between States—a power conferred in view of the sovereign dignity of all the States—for the purpose of destroying the sovereignty of another State by subjecting such State to judicial coercion concerning a claim of a private individual, then it seems to me the State of South Dakota should be treated as any other private individual seeking to enforce a private claim, and should have applied to it by a court of equity the principles of morality and justice which control such courts in refusing aid to persons who acquire merely litigious and speculative claims.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not refer to these expressions of the learned Chief Justice as in any way reflecting on the action of Cuba. She has fully demonstrated her good faith by promptly repudiating the agreement on ascertaining its nature. I do refer to them as fittingly characterizing the action of those Americans who, although familiar with this opinion of the Chief Justice, were still willing to act in defiance of it and to the detriment of one of the States of this Union.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it ought to be known—and it was known in 1871—by this country that the white men of the South were disfranchised and that the colored men were enfranchised; that carpetbaggers and other scoundrels went down there, took charge of the legislature, and issued these bonds for the purpose of building railroads. There never was a shovelful of dirt thrown in their construction, though they hawked $13,000,000 of North Carolina bonds on the market at 5 and 10 cents on the dollar. Those bonds are now owned by these creditors.

I want to say to the Members of the Senate that the Senate of the United States, even in those times of bitterness, sent a committee down to North Carolina composed of some of the greatest men in this body to investigate the question of the issue of these bonds. I wish this extract printed for the same reason I introduced the resolution, because I want not only the States to know but I want the world to know what was done there, and because, Mr. President, these men have gone to Cuba and tendered these bonds to that Republic to carry out their nefarious purposes, in order that other countries may be informed and warned against them.

Suppose they should go to Mexico and donate or sell $43,000,000 worth of bonds which they hold against North Carolina, $100,000,000 worth of bonds, probably, against Georgia and against other Southern States of a similar character, Mexico could bring them as an offset against the claims we may have for depredations committed by that country. Then the matter would go to The Hague, and, as I stated the other day, it might involve a great international question which might result in war.

I want the Senate to listen to the reading of the minority report of a United States Senate committee made in 1871 about these North Carolina bonds. I ask the Secretary to read what I have marked, which is only a short extract, and then I ask that the whole record which I present be printed in the RECORD. I will say that this is taken from a Senate document, and I want Senators to hear what in 1871 a minority report of a committee of the United States Senate stated in regard to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the document referred to, as follows:

These, then, were the methods taken to array the negroes in one compact body against the white people of the State in the election of 1868, under the reconstruction acts of Congress. The election was supervised by Gen. Canby, in command of that military division. Its result is well known. The enfranchised negroes, under the head of Gov. Holden and his carpetbag allies, backed by the military power of the Government, accomplished an easy victory over the disfranchised white people. But to make it complete, Gen. Canby gave orders to exclude a certain number of the conservatives elected to the legislature. Judge Reade, who administered the oath to the members elect, testifies that he was instructed by Gen. Canby to tell certain persons to whom particular disqualifications attached to stand aside, and he then proceeded to administer the oath of office to the remainder. (See testimony of Judge Reade, p. 412.) Thus was the reconstruction of North Carolina accomplished upon a loyal basis—a basis composed of ignorant negroes and unprincipled carpetbaggers, cemented and sustained by military power. The result might have been foreseen. The legislature, moved by a ring of unprincipled adventurers, went to work to squander the money of the people. They issued twenty-five or thirty millions in the bonds of the State to certain railroad companies; the bonds were issued by Holden to these adventurers without exacting compliance with the law; the bonds were sold, and the money went into carpetbags and flitted away from the State. Ten millions of this issue were subsequently declared unconstitutional by the courts of the State, and of the balance not one million of the entire sum was ever applied to the construction of railroads. The value of the bonds sank in the market to 22 cents on the dollar. These transactions appear from the testimony of nearly all the witnesses examined; men of all shades of political sentiment testify to this shameless plunder of the State, and all unite in denouncing the outrage and deploring the ruin and bankruptcy that has been brought upon the State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask my good friend from North Carolina what the report is from which the Secretary is reading?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is a report made to the Senate in 1871, and is taken from a public document.

Mr. GALLINGER. A report made by a committee of the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. By a minority committee of the Senate, and at a time when the heat and passion growing out of the Civil War were strong. The facts are stated in that document, and I wanted the country to know what even a minority committee of the United States Senate has said about this matter at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not understand what the report was.

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

"The majority of this committee allude to this matter as showing the latitude allowed in examination, and are seemingly unconscious of its significance. They do not appear to be aware of the fact that Congress, by establishing a government wholly irresponsible to the people of the State, composed of ignorant negroes without a dollar of property and controlled by designing men in search of pillage, made the plunder of the State inevitable. The same result has followed the same measures in every one of the reconstructed States. All have been plundered, and by the same means."

Again, at page 28 this report said:

"The statements are confirmed by every witness examined on this point; not a single witness contradicts it in any particular. Gov. Holden in his last message to the legislature, page 4, says the debt of the State is $30,000,000, and adds that the people will not and can not pay it. This, then, is the admitted, undeniable condition of the State. It is utterly, hopelessly bankrupt! Ruined, plundered, made bankrupt by the governor and legislature forced upon the State by an act of Congress! Will the people of the North permit this whole community to be thus pillaged and plundered by a government created by their representatives in Congress and sustained in power by their Army—the Army of the United States? What would the people of any Northern State do under like circumstances? What would any brave people do who were thus despoiled; despoiled of their political rights by strangers and the most degraded class of their own citizens, and then plundered of their individual property and made bankrupt as a community?"

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to add to that document the names of the Senators who made the report. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has asked me who they were. This report is signed by Senators Bayard, of Delaware, and Blair, of Missouri.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that he print the original document.

Mr. OVERMAN. That, with all the evidence taken, would be too long, and it is not necessary to print it all. These are the findings, and I think that is all that is necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted.

The document referred to by Mr. OVERMAN in full is as follows:

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 8, 1917.

REPUBLIC OF CUBA, PLAINTIFF, VERSUS THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, DEFENDANT—MOTION FOR LEAVE TO INSTITUTE SUIT.

BRIEF FOR THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, OPPOSING THE MOTION.

The State of North Carolina, one of the sovereign States of the United States, respectfully but earnestly protests to this honorable court that the Republic of Cuba, a foreign State, ought not to be allowed to sue the State of North Carolina in this court upon the causes of action set forth in her declaration, for the following reasons, to wit:

1. The State of North Carolina has not consented and does not consent that she be sued by the Republic of Cuba, and without her consent she can not be sued.

2. The constitution of North Carolina, by section 6, Article I, and section 9, Article IV, denies and forbids the consent of the State to be given to be sued particularly upon the causes of action stated in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba.

3. The Constitution of the United States, by section 10, third clause of Article I, forbids the State of North Carolina, without the consent of Congress, to enter into any compact or agreement with the Republic of Cuba, and no compact, agreement, or contract has been entered into by the State of North Carolina with the Republic of Cuba.

4. The declaration of the Republic of Cuba does not state a controversy between her and the State of North Carolina justifiable under the Constitution of the United States and cognizable under the jurisdiction of this court.

5. This attempt of the Republic of Cuba to sue upon the causes of action stated in her declaration is an attempt to evade the prohibitions of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

6. The declaration proposed to be filed by the Republic of Cuba shows upon its face that its causes of action, to wit, the bonds of the State of North Carolina, are stale claims against said State of North Carolina which this court will not, under established principles of equity jurisprudence, permit to be made the subject of suit.

7. This court will not entertain the suit of the Republic of Cuba upon the causes of action stated in her declaration, because this court would be without power to enforce its judgment against the State of North Carolina.

THE CAUSES OF ACTION STATED IN THE DECLARATION OF THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA FILED WITH HER MOTION TO INSTITUTE SUIT AGAINST THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the year 1868, while the State of North Carolina was being reconstructed under the act of Congress and under the control of the Federal Army, the constitution of 1868 was ratified on April 21, 22, and 23, and at the same time a legislature was elected, which convened in special session on July 1, 1868, and in regular session on November 16, 1868. Hamilton, in his book on Reconstruction in North Carolina, page 430, thus writes of this period and this legislature:

"When the legislature met in special session in July, 1868, the work begun by the convention was continued, for there was small thought of constitutional restrictions, and by this time a well-organized lobby was crying loudly for the prosperity which could only come through the building of railroads and the issue of State bonds for the purpose. At the head of the lobby was Gen. M. S. Littlefield, with an able body of allies, chief of whom was John T. Deweese and George W. Swepson, the latter being the paymaster of the 'ring.' Beginning at this session he allowed members of the legislature to cash their per diem at the Raleigh National Bank, of which he was a director, without charging them any discount. The 'third house' aided greatly in the work of the lobby, and Littlefield's readiness to make loans to needy statesmen, with no expectation of their being repaid, made him the idol of the carpetbaggers and corrupt scalawags, while his radicalism commended him to Republicans who were not tainted with dishonesty. His charm of manner and bonhomie made his company acceptable to many conservatives who at first did not question his motives or character. In the legislature Byron Laflin was the chief member of the ring, and as chairman of the committee on internal improvements was able to render great service to the cause. The 'ring' not only put through its own schemes, but in a short time undertook to market bond legislation at the rate of 10 per cent of the bonds received. Only through its aid could such legislation be secured, and it was thus able to make its own terms."

The bonds of the State authorized for railroad construction at these two sessions of the legislature aggregated $27,850,000; the amount actually issued was $17,640,000. It happened that the constitutionality of some of these acts was litigated in the courts, and the supreme court of the State declared them void, and thereby prevented the issue of about $10,000,000 of State bonds. (Galloway v. Jenkins (1869, January term), 63 N. C., 147; Railroad v. Holden (1869), 63 N. C., 410.)

Although the constitution of the State adopted in 1868 contained in section 1, Article V, a limitation upon the rate of taxation, to wit, that it should not exceed 66⅔ cents on the $100 valuation, as declared by the supreme court in Railroad v. Holden (63 N. C., 427, January term, 1869), this limitation was disregarded and ignored in this reckless railroad legislation, and the special taxes authorized in the several acts of these sessions of the legislature amounted to $0.6683 on the $100 valuation of property alone in excess of the constitutional limit. (See Hamilton on Reconstruction in North Carolina, p. 449.) The levy for general purposes by this same legislature was 35 cents on the $100, thus making the total levy $1.0183. (Ch. 108, Laws 1868–69.) The limit having been reached, none of the constitutional tax rate was left for the ordinary purposes of government. This legislature also disregarded and ignored another section of the constitution of 1868—section 4, Article V, which declared:

"Until the bonds of the State shall be at par the general assembly shall have no power to contract any new debt or pecuniary obligation in behalf of the State, except to supply a casual deficit, or for suppressing invasion or insurrection, unless it shall in the same bill levy a special tax to pay the interest annually. And the general assembly shall have no power to give or lend the credit of the State in aid of any person, association, or corporation except to aid in the completion of such railroads as may be unfinished at the time of the adoption of this constitution, or in which the State has a direct pecuniary interest, unless the subject be submitted to a direct vote of the people of the State, and be approved by a majority of those who shall vote thereon."

In Galloway v. Railroad (63 N. C., 147) and Railroad v. Holden (63 N. C., 410), both decided at January term, 1869, the Supreme Court of North Carolina held that a subscription for stock in a corporation and issuing bonds to pay for such stock is a gift of the credit of the State within the meaning of this section of the constitution, and prohibited thereby, unless approved by a vote of the people of the State. Under the decision of the court in these cases, and some acts of the legislature at its session in 1869–70, several millions of bonds were not issued, and $4,345,000 that had been issued were returned to the State treasurer. The legislature of the State on January 20, 1870, passed a joint resolution (see Public Laws of North Carolina, 1869–70, pp. 226 and 227), as follows:

RESOLUTION IN RELATION TO SPECIAL-TAX BONDS.

"Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the treasurer be instructed not to pay any more interest on the special-tax bonds until authorized and directed so to do by this general assembly."

Further, the Legislature of North Carolina, at its session in 1869–70, passed an act (see Public Laws of North Carolina, 1869–70, ch. 71, which was ratified Mar. 8, 1870) repealing all acts passed at the session of that legislature held in 1868–69 making appropriation to railroad companies and requiring the return to the State treasurer of all bonds then in the hands of the president or other officials of the corporation. The newspapers of the State of that day boldly charged that the bonds were fraudulently and corruptly issued and were invalid, and the New York Stock Board excluded the new State bonds from the exchange. Millions of these bonds had been offered in New York for sale. In addition, on January 19, 1871, the Senate of the United States passed a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to investigate alleged outrages in the Southern States, and this committee, on March 10, 1871, reported to the Senate the evidence taken by it and its conclusions, and the same is Public Document Report No. 1, Forty-second Congress, first session, "Outrages in the Southern States, March, 1871." A minority report was filed by Senators Bayard and Blair, who, after giving the history of the times during which these bonds were issued, the circumstances and methods resorted to to procure their issue, said, at pages 19 and 20 of their report:

"These, then, were the methods taken to array the negroes in one compact body against the white people of the State in the election of 1868 under the reconstruction acts of Congress. The election was supervised by Gen. Canby, in command of that military division. Its result is well known. The enfranchised negroes, under the lead of Gov. Holden and his carpetbag allies, backed by the military power of the Government, accomplished an easy victory over the disfranchised white people. But to make it complete Gen. Canby gave orders to exclude a certain number of the conservatives elected to the legislature. Judge Reade, who administered the oath to the members elect, testifies that he was instructed by Gen. Canby to tell certain persons to whom particular disqualifications attached to stand aside, and he then proceeded to administer the oath of office to the remainder. (See testimony of Judge Reade, p. 412.) Thus was the reconstruction of North Carolina accomplished upon a loyal basis—a basis composed of ignorant negroes and unprincipled carpetbaggers, cemented and sustained by military power. The result might have been foreseen. The legislature, moved by a 'ring' of unprincipled adventurers, went to work to squander the money of the people. They issued twenty-five or thirty millions in the bonds of the State to certain railroad companies; the bonds were issued by Holden to these adventurers without exacting compliance with the law; the bonds were sold and the money went into carpetbags and flitted away from the State. Ten millions of this issue were subsequently declared unconstitutional by the courts of the State, and of the balance not one million of the entire sum was ever applied to the construction of railroads. The value of the bonds sank in the market to 22 cents on the dollar. These transactions appear from the testimony of nearly all the witnesses examined; men of all shades of political sentiment testify to this shameless plunder of the State, and all unite in denouncing the outrage and deploring the ruin and bankruptcy that has been brought upon the State. The majority of this committee allude to this matter as showing the latitude allowed in examination, and are seemingly unconscious of its significance. They do not appear to be aware of the fact that Congress, by establishing a government wholly irresponsible to the people of the State, composed of ignorant negroes without a dollar of property and controlled by designing men in search of pillage, made the plunder of the State inevitable. The same result has followed the same measures in every one of the reconstructed States. All have been plundered, and by the same means."

Again, at page 28, this report said:

"These statements are confirmed by every witness examined on this point; not a single witness contradicts it in any particular. Gov. Holden, in his last message to the legislature, page 4, says the debt of the State is $30,000,000, and adds that the people will not and can not pay it. This, then, is the admitted, undeniable condition of the State. It is utterly, hopelessly bankrupt! Ruined, plundered, made bankrupt by the governor and legislature forced upon the State by an act of Congress! Will the people of the North permit this whole community to be thus pillaged and plundered by a government created by their Representatives in Congress and sustained in power by their Army—the Army of the United States? What would the people of any northern State do under like circumstances? What would any brave people do who were thus despoiled; despoiled of their political rights by strangers and the most degraded class of their own citizens, and then plundered of their individual property and made bankrupt as a community?"

The bonds described in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba belong to the class of bonds authorized and issued in the manner and under the circumstances so vividly portrayed in the above report made to the Senate of the United States and published as a public document more than 45 years ago, within less than two years after the bonds were issued, at a time when the bonds had ceased to have any market value, long before the maturity of the bonds, and many years before the Republic of Cuba achieved its independence from Spain and became an independent State. So aroused did the people of the State become at the pillage and plunder of their State, so convinced were they that these bonds were "conceived in fraud and born in iniquity," and were not and ought not to be paid by the State along with her valid obligations, that they, in the year 1880, amended section 6, Article I, of the constitution of the State to read as follows:

SECTION 6, ARTICLE I.

"The State shall never assume or pay or authorize the collection of any debt or obligation, express or implied, incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; nor shall the general assembly assume or pay or authorize the collection of any tax to pay, either directly or indirectly, expressed or implied, any debt or bond incurred or issued by authority of the convention of the year 1868, nor any debt or bond incurred or issued by the legislature of the year 1868, either at its special session or at its regular sessions of the years 1868 and 1869, and 1869 and 1870, except the bonds issued to fund the interest on the old debt of the State, unless the proposing to pay the same shall have first been submitted to the people and by them ratified by the vote of a majority of all the qualified voters of the State at a regular election held for that purpose."

Thus was notice given to the world by public acts and public documents of the fraudulent methods resorted to to procure the issue of these bonds; of the plunder and pillage of the State; of the ruin brought to its credit; of the State's attitude of determined resistance to the payment of these bonds or any of them. This notice thus publicly given was published long before the Republic of Cuba was created and long before it could have acquired these bonds. The inference is irresistible that the Republic of Cuba did not buy these bonds in the open market for the reason that they were valueless; it must have acquired these bonds from persons forbidden by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution to sue the State of North Carolina, and now, in her own name, as a foreign State, the Republic of Cuba moves to institute an action of debt in this court—an action without precedent in the judicial history of the country. If the right exists under the Federal Constitution, it has not been called into exercise since the adoption of the Constitution, now more than a century and a quarter ago. We earnestly insist that no such right is vested in the Republic of Cuba.

ARGUMENT.

I.

The State of North Carolina has not consented and does not consent that she be sued by the Republic of Cuba, and without such the State can not be sued.

The Republic of Cuba was not, nor was any foreign power, a party to the compact of the States in the Constitution of the United States. That great instrument was the compact solely and exclusively between the States of the United States and their people. No foreign power assumed any of the burdens or obligations imposed by that great compact of the sovereign States; it imposed no duties upon any foreign power; it conferred no rights upon any foreign nation. No foreign power is bound in any wise by the compact of the Constitution; it was not created nor constructed nor adopted for the benefit of any foreign power, but solely "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for a common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." The several States to compose the United States under the Constitution alone ratified and accepted it.

In United States v. Diekelman (92 U. S., 520, 524), the court said:

"One nation treats with the citizens of another only through their government. A sovereign can not be sued in his own courts without his consent. His own dignity, as well as the dignity of the nation he represents, prevents his appearance to answer a suit against him in the courts of another sovereignty, except in performance of his obligations, by treaty or otherwise, voluntarily assumed. Hence a citizen of one nation wronged by the conduct of another nation must seek redress through his own government. His sovereign must assume the responsibility of presenting his claim, or it need not be considered. If this responsibility is assumed the claim may be prosecuted as one nation proceeds against another, not by suit in the courts, as of right, but by diplomacy, or, if need be, by war. It rests with the sovereign against whom the demand is made to determine for himself what he will do in respect to it. He may pay, or reject it; he may submit to arbitration, open his own courts to suit, or consent to be tried in the courts of another nation. All depends upon himself." (Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 257, 321; Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264, 380; Hamilton, Federalist, No. 80.)

In Third Elliott's Debates, page 533, Mr. Madison said:

"I do not conceive that any controversy can ever be decided in these courts between an American State and a foreign State, without the consent of the parties. If they consent provision is here made. The disputes ought to be tried by the National tribunal. This is consonant to the law of nations."

In Third Elliott's Debates, pages 555, 556, Mr. Marshall said:

"I hope that no gentleman will think that a State will be called at the bar of the Federal Court. Is there no such cast at present? Are there not many cases in which the Legislature of Virginia is a party, and yet the State is not sued? It is not rational to suppose that the sovereign power should be dragged before a court."

At page 557 Mr. Marshall said:

"If a foreign State brought a suit against the Commonwealth of Virginia, would she not be barred from the claim if the Federal judiciary thought it unjust? The previous consent of the parties is necessary; and as the Federal judiciary will decide each party will acquiesce. It will be the means of preventing disputes with foreign nations."

There seems no doubt that suits against States for the collection of debts were unheard of at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and it would seem that the power to bring such actions would have been denied as promptly as the right of a citizen to sue the State was denied by the adoption of the eleventh amendment.

In the Federalist, No. 81, page 446, Mr. Hamilton said:

"It has been suggested that an assignment of the public securities of one State to the citizens of another would enable them to prosecute that State in the Federal courts for the amount of those securities. A suggestion which the following considerations prove to be without foundation: It is inherent in the nature of sovereignty not to be amenable to the suit of an individual without its consent. This is the general sense, and the general practice of mankind; and the exemption, as one of the attributes of sovereignty, is now enjoyed by the government of every State in the Union. Unless, therefore, there is a surrender of this immunity in the plan of the convention it will remain with the States, and the danger intimated must be merely ideal. The circumstances which are necessary to produce an alienation of State sovereignty were discussed in considering the article on taxation, and need not be repeated here. A recurrence to the principles there established will satisfy us that there is no color to pretend that the State governments would, by the adoption of that plan, be divested of the privilege of paying their own debts in their own way, free from every constraint but that which flows from the obligations of good faith. The contracts between a nation and individuals are only binding in the conscience of the sovereign, and have no pretensions to a compulsive force. They confer no right of action independent of the sovereign will. To what purpose would it be to authorize suits against States for the debts they owe? How could recoveries be enforced? It is evident it could not be done without waging war against the contracting State; and to ascribe to the Federal courts, by mere implication and in destruction of a preexisting right of State government, a power which would involve such a consequence would be altogether forced and unwarrantable."

In Beers v. State of Arkansas (20 How., 527), Mr. Chief Justice Taney, speaking for this court, said:

"It is an established principle of jurisprudence in all civilized nations that the sovereign can not be sued in its own courts, or in any other, without its consent and permission; but it may, if it thinks proper, waive this privilege, and permit himself to be made defendant in a suit by individuals or by another State. And as this permission is altogether voluntary on the part of the sovereignty, it follows that it may prescribe the terms and conditions on which it consents to be sued and the manner in which the suit shall be conducted, and may withdraw its consent whenever it may suppose that justice to the public requires it." (Clark v. Barnard, 108 U. S., 436.)

Likewise, this court held in Bank of Washington v. Arkansas (20 How., 530, 532), Mr. Chief Justice Taney again speaking for the court:

"Those who deal in the bonds and obligations of a sovereign State are aware that they must rely altogether on the sense of justice and good faith of the State, and that the judiciary of the State can not interfere to enforce these contracts without the consent of the State; and the courts of the United States are expressly prohibited from exercising such jurisdiction."

Mr. Webster, in his opinion given to Baring Bros. & Co. October 16, 1839, volume 6, pages 537, 539, said:

"The security for the State loans is the plighted faith of the State as a political community. It rests on the same basis as other contracts with established governments, the same basis, for example, as loans made by the United States under the authority of Congress; that is to say, the good faith of the Government making the loan and its ability to fulfill its engagements."

In Crouch v. Credit Fancier (8 Court of Q. B., 374, 384, 1872-73), Mr. Justice Blackburn said:

"Foreign and colonial governments frequently create a public debt, the title to portions of which is made to depend on the possession of bonds expressed to be payable to the bearer or holders. There can hardly be said properly to be any right of action on such instruments at all, though the holder has a claim on the Government."

Hamilton, in his report in 1795 (Annals of Cong., 1793-95, 3d Cong., p. 1635), said:

"Public debt can scarcely in legal phrase be defined either as property in possession or in action. It is evidently not the first until it is reduced to possession by payment. To be the second would suppose a legal power to compel payment by suit. Does such a power exist? The true definition is such a property subsisting in the faith of the Government. Its essence is promise. Its definite value depends upon the reliance that the promise will be definitely fulfilled."

In Hans v. Louisiana (134 U. S., 1), Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, said:

"The suability of a State without its consent was a thing unknown to the law. This has been so often laid down and acknowledged by courts and jurists that it is hardly necessary to be formally asserted. It was fully shown by an exhaustive examination of the old law by Mr. Justice Iredell in his opinion in Chisholm v. Georgia; and it has been conceded in every case since where the question has in any way been presented, even in the cases which have gone furthest in sustaining suits against the officers or agents of States. (Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat., 738; Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203; Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S., 53; United States v. Lee, 106 U. S., 196; Virginia Coupon cases, 114 U. S., 269.) In all these cases the effort was to show, and the court held, that the suits were not against the State or the United States, but against individuals, conceding that if they had been against either the State or the United States they could not be maintained."

In this opinion the court further said:

"To avoid misapprehension it may be proper to add that, although the obligations of a State rest for their performance upon its honor and good faith, and can not be made the subjects of judicial cognizance unless the State consents to be sued or comes itself into court, yet where property or rights are enjoyed under a grant or contract made by a State they can not wantonly be invaded. Whilst the State can not be compelled by suit to perform its contracts, any attempt on its part to violate property or rights acquired under its contracts may be judicially resisted; and any law impairing the obligation of contracts under which such property or rights are held is void and powerless to affect their enjoyment."

We deem it not required in opposing this motion to discuss the question whether the Constitution is a compact between sovereign States or a compact by the sovereign people of sovereign States in the plenitude of their power, to form a more perfect union, and to establish the supreme law for their control and observance, for it is undeniable that no foreign power was a party to the compact, nor the citizen or subject of any foreign nation. We can not conceive that a foreign power can, as a matter of right, maintain any privilege or right under that compact. (Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall., 419 (opinion of Chief Justice Jay, 471); Rhode Island v. Mass., 12 Pet., 657 (opinion of Justice Baldwin, p. 720); Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet., 515 (opinion of Justice McLean, p. 569); Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 304 (opinion of Justice Story, 524, 525); 1 Story's Com. on the Constitution, ch. 3.)

We deduce from these authorities:

(1) That the State possesses the sovereign attribute of exemption from suit for debt except when her consent is given.

(2) That the ordinary obligations or promises to pay issued by a State were not justiciable in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution.

(3) That no foreign power was a party to the compact of the Constitution, and that the Constitution confers no rights upon a foreign State enforceable against a State by judicial decree.

(4) That the State of North Carolina has not consented to be sued by the Republic of Cuba upon the causes of action set forth in her declaration.

II.

The constitution of North Carolina, by section 6, article 1, and section 9, article 4, denies and forbids the consent of the State to be given to be sued, particularly upon the cause of action stated in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba.

Section 9, article 4, of the constitution of North Carolina, adopted in April, 1868, is as follows:

"The supreme court shall have original jurisdiction to hear claims against the State, but its decisions shall be merely recommendatory; no process in the nature of execution shall issue thereon; they shall be reported to the next session of the general assembly for its action."

This section of the constitution became a part of every contract between the State and those who dealt with it.

With full knowledge and information of the methods used in procuring the issue of the bonds of the class specified in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba, and fully determined not to pay them, the people of North Carolina adopted section 6, article 1, of their constitution, which has been quoted in full above in this brief. The State of North Carolina has in the most emphatic way denied its consent for any suit or action to be brought against it on the bonds specified in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba. The people of the State have expressly and in terms forbidden the legislature to pay, assume to pay, or levy any tax to pay any of these bonds, except the measure to pay be duly approved by a majority of their qualified votes at an election held for that purpose.

III.

The Constitution of the United States, by section 10, clause 3, Article I, forbids the State of North Carolina, without the consent of Congress, to enter into any compact or agreement with the Republic of Cuba; and no compact, agreement, or contract has been entered into by the State of North Carolina with the Republic of Cuba.

This clause of the Constitution reads:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power."

In Green v. Biddle (1823, 8 Wheat., 1), this court said:

"Let it be observed, in the first place, that the Constitution makes no provision respecting the mode or form in which the consent of Congress is to be signified, very properly leaving that matter to the wisdom of that body, to be decided upon according to the ordinary rules of law and of right reason. The only question in cases which involve that point is, has Congress, by some positive act in relation to such agreement, signified the consent of that body to its validity?"

In that case the court held that the act of the State of Virginia agreeing to the erection of Kentucky into a State and prescribing the terms and conditions, and the acceptance by the people of Kentucky, and their approval in their constitution of these terms and conditions, created a compact between those States valid and binding upon the consent of Congress.

In Poole v. Fleeger (11 Pet., 185), this court again held that the agreement between two States—Tennessee and Kentucky—as to State boundary was a compact that required the consent of the Congress for its validity. In neither of these cases did the court define the meaning of the words "compact" and "agreement," as used in this clause, but in Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet., 540), Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in his opinion, concurred in by Messrs. Justices Story, McLean, and Wayne, said:

"But the question does not rest upon the prohibition to enter into a treaty. In the very next clause of the Constitution the States are forbidden to enter into any 'agreement' or 'compact' with a foreign nation, and as these words could not have been idly or superfluously used by the framers of the Constitution, they can not be construed to mean the same thing with the word treaty. They evidently mean something more and were designed to make the prohibition more comprehensive. A few extracts from an eminent writer on the laws of nations, showing the manner in which these different words have been used and the different meanings sometimes attached to them, will, perhaps, contribute to explain the reason for using them all in the Constitution, and will prove that the most comprehensive terms were employed in prohibiting to the States all intercourse with foreign nations (quoting from Vattel). After reading these extracts we can be at no loss to comprehend the intention of the framers of the Constitution in using all these words—'treaty,' 'compact,' 'agreement.' The word 'agreement' does not necessarily import any direct and express stipulation, nor is it necessary that it should be in writing. If there is a verbal understanding to which both parties have assented and upon which both are acting it is an 'agreement,' and the use of all these terms—'treaty,' 'agreement,' and 'compact'—show that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to use the broadest and most comprehensive terms, and that they anxiously desired to cut off all connection or communication between a State and a foreign power; and we shall fail to execute that evident intention unless we give to the word 'agreement' its most extended signification and so apply it as to prohibit every agreement, written or verbal, formal or informal, positive or implied, by the mutual understanding of the parties."

This case presented to the court the question whether Holmes, an escaped murderer from the Province of Quebec, in lower Canada, could be lawfully arrested under a warrant of the governor of Vermont and delivered by its officer under the command of the warrant to an agent of the Canadian authorities. The Chief Justice gave his reasons for his interpretation of these words in the following language:

"The framers of the Constitution manifestly believed that any intercourse between a State and a foreign nation was dangerous to the Union; that it would open a door of which foreign powers would avail themselves to obtain influence in separate States. Provisions were therefore introduced to cut off all negotiations and intercourse between the State authorities and foreign nations. If they could make no agreement, either in writing or by parol, formal or informal, there would be no occasion for negotiations or intercourse between the State authorities and a foreign Government. Hence prohibitions were introduced which were supposed to be sufficient to cut off all communications between them."

If the treasuries of foreign powers may be looked to by the States as a market for their bonds, with the power lodged in this court to enforce payment, is not the danger by such intercourse and such agreements obvious "to obtain influence" in separate States? And may not foreign powers, with insidious designs upon the United States, discover in such an opportunity "to obtain influence" in some State? The dangers which the great framers of the Constitution apprehended, and which they anxiously endeavored to avoid might, by a different construction of this clause, become active, and present an opportunity of harm to our common country. If a foreign nation can recover a judgment against a State in an ordinary action of debt ("an anomalous and unheard-of proceeding"), and enforce the collection of the debt by the process of this court, why may it not result in the acquisition of territory in the State, and at some convenient place?

One great fear of the framers of the Constitution, as expressed by its early expounders—Hamilton, Madison, Jay, and others—was that the conduct of the States toward foreign powers and their subjects might involve the Nation in war. To guard against such a calamity, it was clearly the purpose of the Constitution to cut off all communication or intercourse between the States as States and foreign powers. (Madison, 3 Elliott's Debates, 533; Hamilton, Federalist, No. 80.)

In opposition to this construction of this clause and this interpretation of these words, this court said in Virginia v. Tennessee (148 U. S., 503):

"Is the agreement made without the consent of Congress between Virginia and Tennessee to appoint commissioners to run and mark the boundary line between them within the prohibition of this clause? The terms, 'agreement' or 'compact,' taken by themselves, are sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all forms of stipulation, written or verbal, and relating to all kinds of subjects: to those to which the United States can have no possible objection or have any interest in interfering with, as well as to those which may tend to increase and build up the political influence of the contracting States, so as to encroach upon or impair the supremacy of the United States or interfere with their rightful management of particular subjects placed under their entire control. * * * If, then, the terms 'compact' or 'agreement' in the Constitution do not apply to every possible compact or agreement between one State and another, for the validity of which the consent of Congress must be obtained, to what compact or agreements does the Constitution apply? We can only reply by looking at the object of the constitutional provision and construing the terms 'agreement' and 'compact' in reference to it.

"It is a familiar rule in the construction of terms to apply to them the meaning naturally attaching to them from their context. Noscitur a sociis is a rule of construction applicable to all written instruments where any particular word is obscure or of doubtful meaning. Taken by itself, its obscurity or doubt may be removed by reference to associated words, and the meaning of a term may be enlarged or restrained by reference to the object of the whole clause in which it is used. Looking at the clause in which the terms 'compact' or 'agreement' appear, it is evident that the prohibition is directed to the formation of any combination tending to the increase of political power in the States, which may encroach upon or interfere with the just supremacy of the United States. Story, in his Commentaries (sec. 1403), referring to a previous part of the same section of the Constitution in which the clause in question appears, observes that its language 'may be more plausibly interpreted from the terms used—"treaty," "alliance," or "confederation"—and upon the ground that the sense of each is best known by its association (noscitur a sociis) to apply to treaties of a political character, such as treaties of alliance for purposes of peace and war, and treaties of confederation, in which the parties are leagued for mutual government, political cooperation, and the exercise of political sovereignty, or conferring internal political jurisdiction or external political dependence or general commercial privileges,' and that 'the latter clause, "compacts and agreements," might then very properly apply to such as regarded what might be deemed mere private rights of sovereignty, such as questions of boundary, interest in land situate in the territory of each other, and other internal regulations for the mutual comfort and convenience of States bordering on each other,' and he adds: 'In such cases the consent of Congress may be properly required in order to check any infringement of the rights of the National Government, and at the same time a total prohibition to enter into any compact or agreement might be attended with permanent inconvenience or public mischief.' Compacts or agreements—and we do not perceive any difference in the meaning, except that the word 'compact' is generally used with reference to more formal and serious engagements than is usually implied in the term 'agreement'—cover all stipulations affecting the conduct or claims of the parties."

This language was quoted with approval in Wharton v. Wise (153 U. S., 155); Stearns v. Minnesota (179 U. S., 223).

In the case of Virginia v. Tennessee, supra, nor in the later opinion cited above, is the case of Holmes v. Jennison, supra, cited. These decisions restrict the meaning of the word "agreement" as used in the Constitution by the doctrine of construction known as the "noscitur a sociis," while in Holmes v. Jennison, delivered in 1840, in the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Taney, the most comprehensive meaning should be given. Mr. Justice Story concurred in this opinion, and it was delivered after he had written (1833) his Commentaries on the Constitution.

In Virginia v. West Virginia (206 U. S., 290, and 220 U. S., 1) we understand this court to have held (1) that the agreement made by West Virginia (formed out of the State of Virginia) to assume and pay its just proportion of the public debt of Virginia existing at the time of the creation of West Virginia as a State, and made in accordance with the terms of Virginia's consent to the creation of West Virginia, embodied in her constitution and approved by the Congress of the United States, was a compact or agreement enforceable by suit in the Supreme Court; and (2) that the consent of West Virginia to be sued in this court by Virginia was given when the former was admitted as a State, and created a justiciable cause of action. In 220 U. S., at page 36, this court thus referred to the controversy:

"As this is no ordinary commercial suit, but, as we have said, a quasi-international difference referred to this court in reliance upon the honor and constitutional obligations of the States concerned, rather than upon ordinary remedies, we think it best at this step to go no further, but to await the effect of a conference between the parties, which, whatever the outcome, must take place."

In the proposed action by the Republic of Cuba, as is stated in her declaration, we have nothing but an "ordinary commercial suit," based upon no compact or agreement between her and North Carolina assented to by the Congress of the United States, but an action which the public documents and records hereinabove referred to show is an attempt by the Republic of Cuba to enforce the collection of bonds of the State of North Carolina discredited in the markets of the world by the corrupt and fraudulent methods used in procuring their issue, and expressly repudiated by the State of North Carolina many years before the Republic of Cuba became an independent foreign power.

But it is contended in the brief filed for the Republic of Cuba in this motion that this court, in its decision in the case of South Dakota v. North Carolina (192 U. S., 286) held that a bond issued by a State and held by another State presented a controversy within the meaning of section 2, Article III, of the Constitution, and justiciable in an action in this court, and thereby disassociated this section of the Constitution from clause 3, section 10, Article I, of the Constitution. The view we now present was not considered in that case. The bonds, if ever legal, set forth in the declaration of the Republic of Cuba were issued by the State of North Carolina as a sovereign State; it was an act done under her great seal of State in her sovereign capacity; it was directed by her legislature; her sovereign power to levy and collect taxes was invoked in the acts authorizing these bonds to be issued; and the holder of these bonds holds them under an agreement with a sovereign State, invoking an act of sovereignty on her part. The Republic of Cuba, as a sovereign foreign power and in her capacity as a sovereign, invokes the jurisdiction of this court to aid her to enforce an agreement made with her by the State of North Carolina, acting as a sovereign and in a matter within her sovereign capacity, in which the property of the State of North Carolina is sought to be sequestered and taken for the benefit of the Republic of Cuba (a foreign power) or her sovereign power to levy taxes for the benefit of the Republic of Cuba enforced by this court, and the property of the sovereign people of North Carolina taken for a foreign power, and this without the consent, express or implied, of Congress. No such power has been invoked since the Constitution was adopted in 1789. We earnestly insist that this is an "anomalous and unheard of suit," using the words of this court in Hans v. Louisiana, supra, "which it was not the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to be raised up by the adoption of that great instrument."

We respectfully submit that the judicial power should extend only to such controversies between a State and a foreign power as grow out of compacts and agreements entered into between such State and such foreign power, with the assent of Congress. We can not conceive that Congress would consent that a State enter into a compact or agreement that would intrench upon the political power of the Federal Government, or that would impair the political relations of the State to the United States. If the words "compact" or "agreement" are restricted to such agreements as intrench upon the political rights or influence of the United States in their relation to the States, then we are at a loss to conceive the occasion when the Congress of the United States would ever give its consent, nor should it. Such an act would defeat one of the great purposes of the Constitution—to form a more perfect Union. And in the words of Chief Justice Taney, "We shall fail to execute that evident intent unless we give to the word 'agreement' its most extended signification, and so apply it as to prohibit every agreement, written or verbal, formal or informal, positive or implied, by the mutual understanding of the parties."

IV.

The declaration of the Republic of Cuba does not state a controversy between her and the State of North Carolina justiciable under the Constitution of the United States and cognizable under the jurisdiction of this court.

What has been already said in this brief presents in part the views of the State of North Carolina on this objection to the allowance of the motion for leave to sue. The declaration is nothing more than an ordinary action of debt. Its purpose is to secure an ordinary judgment in debt; it seeks to enforce no lien; it seeks to enforce no compact or agreement entered into with the assent of Congress; it seeks a judgment which can be enforced only by a compulsive force applied to the legislative department of the State to levy a tax to pay the judgment.

This court has never in its history assumed jurisdiction of such an action. One of the reasons assigned why an action can not be maintained against a State to compel the payment of its debts, whoever may be the plaintiff, is that it might necessitate an interference with if not the complete control and direction of, the legislative function of assessing, levying, collecting, and distributing taxes, which this court up to the present has regarded beyond its competency. In this case there is no means of rendering the judgment effective unless this court is prepared, through its receiver, to take charge of and administer the affairs of a delinquent State.

In Cherokee Nation v. State of Georgia (5 Pet., 1), Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said:

"The mere question of right might, perhaps, be decided by this court in a proper case with proper parties. But the court is asked to do more than decide on the title. The bill requires us to control the Legislature of Georgia and to restrain the exertion of its physical force. The propriety of such an interposition by the court may well be questioned. It seems too much of the exercise of political power to be within the proper province of the judicial department."

Prof. Dicey, in his work on the Conflict of Laws, page 38, says:

"General principle No. 3: The sovereign of a country, acting through the courts thereof, has jurisdiction over (i. e., has a right to adjudicate upon) any matter with regard to which he can give an effective judgment, and has no jurisdiction over (i. e., has no right to adjudicate upon) any matter with regard to which he can not give an effective judgment."

In Gordon v. United States (117 U. S., 697), Mr. Chief Justice Taney said:

"The award of execution is a part and an essential part of every judgment passed by a court exercising judicial power. It is no judgment, in the legal sense of the term, without it. Without such an award the judgment would be inoperative and nugatory, leaving the aggrieved party without a remedy. It would be merely an opinion which would remain a dead letter, and without any operation upon the rights of the parties, unless Congress should at some future time sanction it and pass a law authorizing the court to carry its opinion into effect. Indeed, no principle of constitutional law has been more firmly established or constantly adhered to than the one above stated; that is, that this court has no jurisdiction in any case where it can not render judgment in the legal sense of the term, and when it depends upon the legislature to carry its opinion into effect or not, at the pleasure of Congress." (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447, 483; Porto Rico v. Rosaly, 227 U. S., 270; Pam-To-Tee v. United States, 187 U. S., 371; see also Judge Miller's Work on the Constitution, p. 314; Mr. Justice Iredell's opinion in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall., at pp. 445. 446.)

In United States v. Guthrie (17 How., 284, 303), Mr. Goodrich was appointed chief justice of the Territory of Minnesota, and before the expiration of his term he was removed and Mr. Fuller was appointed in his stead and received the salary. Mr. Goodrich being refused, upon demand, the balance of his salary, brought mandamus against the Secretary of the Treasury to compel its payment. Upon writ of error this court said:

"The only legitimate inquiry for our determination upon the case before us is this, Whether, under the organization of the Federal Government or by any known principle of law there can be asserted a power in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, or in this court, to command the withdrawal of a sum or sums of money from the Treasury of the United States, to be applied in satisfaction of disputed or contravened claims against the United States? This is the question, the very question presented for our determination; and its simple statement would seem to carry with it the most startling considerations; nay, its unavoidable negation, unless this should be prevented by some positive and controlling command; for it would occur, a priori, to every mind that a treasury not fenced around or shielded by fixed and established modes and rules of administration, but which could be subjected to any number or description of demands, asserted and sustained through the undefined and undefinable discretion of the courts, would constitute a feeble and inadequate provision for the great and inevitable necessities of the Nation. The Government, under such a régime; or, rather, under such an absence of all rule, would, if practicable at all, be administered not by the great departments ordained by the Constitution and laws, and guided by the modes therein prescribed, but by the uncertain and perhaps contradictory action of the courts in the enforcement of their views of private interests."

These observations apply with equal force to the treasuries of the States, which are sovereign within the province of their reserved powers, including the management of their fiscal affairs. To the fact that the legislative department (the department which controls the purse and appropriates money) is, and has been for centuries, separate and independent, and not subject to compulsive means, can be ascribed many of the most cherished rights of the English-speaking people. This department of government is, under the constitution of North Carolina, singularly free and independent of the executive and judicial, in that the executive is denied the veto power.

The constitution of North Carolina, Article XIV, section 3, provides:

"No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

Again, we submit, this section of the constitution became a part of the contract between the State and those who dealt with it.

The Supreme Court of North Carolina held in Garner v. Worth, 122 North Carolina, 250:

"The courts can not direct the State treasury to pay a claim against the State, however just and unquestioned, when there is no legislative appropriation to pay the same; and when there is such an appropriation the coercive power is applied not to compel the payment of the State liability but to compel a public servant to discharge his duty by obedience to a legislative enactment." (See also Railroad v. Jenkins, Treasurer, 68 N. C., 499; Shaffer v. Jenkins, Treasurer, 72 N. C., 275.)

In many of the cases in this court in which attempts have been made to collect debts from States it has been clearly intimated that, over and above the objection that States are exempt from suit by the eleventh amendment, courts had no process by which they could collect debts from States.

In Marye v. Parsons, 114 United States, 325, 328, Mr. Justice Matthews, speaking for the court, said:

"So far as the contract with the complainant was, that the State should pay to him his coupons at maturity, there is no doubt a breach, but he asks no relief as to that, for there is no remedy by suit to compel the State to pay its debt."

In re Ayers (123 U. S., 443, 491), Mr. Justice Matthews again said:

"The remedy sought, in order to be complete, would require the court to assume all the executive authority of the State, so far as it related to the enforcement of this law, and to supervise the conduct of all persons charged with any official duty in respect to the levy, collection, and disbursement of the tax in question until the bonds, principal and interest, were paid in full; and that, too, in a proceeding in which the State as a State was not and could not be made a party. It needs no argument to show that the political power can not be thus divested of its jurisdiction and the judiciary set in its place."

In Rees v. City of Watertown (19 Wall., 107, 116, 117), the court said:

"We are of opinion that this court has not the power to direct a tax to be levied for the payment of these judgments. The power to impose burdens and raise money is the highest attribute of sovereignty, and is exercised, first, to raise money for public purposes only; and, second, by the power of legislative authority only. It is a power that has not been extended to the judiciary; especially is it beyond the power of the Federal judiciary to assume the place of a State in the exercise of this authority, at once so delicate and so important."

It is suggested that it is the duty of the Court to assume jurisdiction, hear the case, and adjudge the indebtedness, even if it can not enforce its judgment, but must leave it optional to the State of North Carolina whether she will satisfy the judgment. This suggestion does not, we respectfully submit, accord with the authorities we have cited, nor with the course pursued by this court in Kentucky v. Dennison (24 How., 66)—to decline jurisdiction unless it has the power to execute its judgment.

"But no court sits to determine questions of law in this." (Marye v. Parsons, 114 U. S., 330; Ex rel Broderich v. Morton, 156 N. Y., 136.)

But it is insisted that in the case of South Dakota v. North Carolina (192 U. S., 286) this court held that an action by one State against another State on its bonds was an action to enforce a property right; was a "controversy" within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court. In that case, Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the majority of the court, said:

"Without noticing in detail the other cases referred to by Mr. Justice Shiras in Missouri v. Illinois (180 U. S., 208) it is enough to say that the clear import of the decisions of this court from the beginning to the present time is in favor of its jurisdiction over an action brought by one State against another to enforce a property right. Chisholm against Georgia was an action of assumpsit; United States against North Carolina was an action of debt; United States against Michigan a suit for an accounting; and that which was sought in each was a money judgment against the defendant State."

To this conclusion Mr. Justice White dissented, and his dissent was concurred in by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller and Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice McKenna. But in that case no judgment was given against the defendant State, but the court directed the sale of certain shares of stock in a railroad company pledged to secure the bonds sued upon and reserved the question as to whether a judgment for the deficiency could be entered; and upon this question the court said:

"There is in this case a mortgage of property, and the sale of that property under a foreclosure may satisfy the plaintiff's claim. If that should be the result there would be no necessity for a personal judgment against the State. Equity is satisfied by a decree for a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged property, leaving the question of a judgment over for any deficiency to be determined when, if ever, it arises. And surely if, as we have often held, this court has jurisdiction of an action by one State against another to recover a tract of land, there would seem to be no doubt of the jurisdiction of one to enforce the delivery of personal property."

The court then directed a decree to be entered for the sale of the pledged stock to be applied to the debt as ascertained.

In speaking of the authority of the decision of the court in Chisholm v. Georgia, this court had said in Hans v. Louisiana (134 U. S., 1), Mr. Justice Bradley delivering the opinion:

"Adhering to the mere letter, it might be so; and so, in fact, the Supreme Court held in Chisholm v. Georgia; but looking at the subject as Hamilton did, and as Mr. Justice Iredell did, in the light of history and experience and the established order of things, the views of the latter were clearly right, as the people of the United States in their sovereign capacity subsequently decided."

In United States v. North Carolina the State consented to be sued in an action of debt, and submitted the matter in controversy to the decision of this court, though by the strict letter of the Constitution controversies between the United States and the States were not within the jurisdiction of this court.

In United States v. Michigan the controversy arose out of an agreement or compact made by the United States through Congress with the State of Michigan, though for a pecuniary demand.

In controversies between States, justiciable in their nature, the consent of the States to be sued by a State is given by and at the time of its admission into the Union. (Virginia v. West Virginia, 201 U. S., 290; Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264.)

The States when and by their admission to the Union become parties to the compact, each has the reciprocal right of suit in a controversy of a justiciable nature But all controversies between States are not justiciable, and though they come within the letter of the Constitution as decided by the court in New Hampshire v. Louisiana (108 U. S., 76), Wisconsin v. Pelican Insurance Co. (127 U. S., 265), Kentucky v. Dennison (24 How., 66), Hans v. Louisiana (134 U. S., 1).

But the Constitution, as before stated, is not a compact entered into between the States and foreign powers, and the right to sue is not reciprocal; and we submit that consent to be sued must be given, and the controversies which are of a justiciable nature between a State and a foreign power are those only that arise out of compacts or agreements entered into with the consent of Congress; and further, that this court has no power to enforce its judgment, and for this reason without jurisdiction.

V.

The attempt of the Republic of Cuba to sue upon the causes of action stated in her declaration is an attempt to evade the prohibitions of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The bonds described in the declaration were issued as of October 1, 1868, many years before the Republic of Cuba became a foreign power. They were dishonored and repudiated as having been corruptly and fraudulently issued, likewise many years before Cuba was born as a Republic. Since 1871 they have had no market value, and their history and record have been since then found in a public document of the Congress of the United States. The inference is plain and irresistible that the Republic of Cuba has recently acquired these bonds from some person or persons denied by the eleventh amendment the right to sue the State of North Carolina. If not, why this long delay in invoking a right to sue which she insists is so clearly hers as a foreign nation? These bonds matured as to their principal in 1898, and some of the coupons were due in 1869. If these bonds and coupons were acquired by the Republic of Cuba before maturity—a view ordinarily regarded as more favorable to her claim—then the long delay inferable from this fact should now bar her from asserting so stale a claim under the well-recognized principle of equity jurisprudence, "Vigilantibus et non dormientibus equitas subvenit." No stronger or clearer evidence of the recognition of the immunity of the States from suits as a right of their sovereignty could have been given than the promptness with which the eleventh amendment was adopted after the decision of the court in Chisholm v. Georgia. If the State can be sued by a foreign power in an ordinary action of debt, and a judgment rendered against her by this court, we earnestly submit the following language of the court in Hans v. Louisiana is strikingly apposite:

"If this is the necessary consequence of the language of the Constitution and the law, the result is no less startling and unexpected than was the original decision of this court that, under the language of the Constitution and of the judiciary act of 1789, a State was liable to be sued by a citizen of another State or of a foreign country."

Every attempt to evade the eleventh amendment has been steadily repelled by this court, as appears from these and many other cases: Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. (109 U. S., 446); Louisiana v. Jumel (107 U. S., 711); Hagood v. Southern (117 U. S., 52); Ex Parte Ayers (123 U. S., 443); North Carolina v. Temple (134 U. S., 22); New Hampshire v. Louisiana (108 U. S., 76); Murray v. Wilson Distilling Co. (213 U. S., 151).

VI.

The declaration proposed to be filed by the Republic of Cuba shows upon its face that its causes of action, to wit, the bonds of the State of North Carolina, are stale claims against said State of North Carolina which this court will not, under established principles of equity jurisprudence, permit to be made the subject of suit.

The contention of the Republic of Cuba is that "States and cities, when they borrow money and contract to repay it with interest, are not acting as sovereignties. They come down to the level of ordinary individuals" (Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S., 432, 445). Then, in acquiring such securities the Republic of Cuba has come down to the level of ordinary individuals, and the same principles of law that govern ordinary individuals should apply to her. As said by the court in French Republic v. Saratoga Vichy Co. (191 U. S., 427, 438):

"In such cases, either where the Government is suing for the use and benefit of an individual, or for the prosecution of a private and proprietary instead of a public or governmental right, it is clear that it is not entitled to the exemption of nullum tempus, and that the ordinary rule of laches applies in full force. United States v. Beebe (127 U. S., 338); New Hampshire v. Louisiana (108 N. C., 76); Maryland v. Baldwin (112 U. S., 490); United States v. Des Moines, etc., Co. (142 U. S., 510, 538); Custner v. United States (149 U. S., 662); United States v. American Bell Telephone Co. (167 U. S., 224, 264); Miller v. The State (38 Ala., 600); Moody v. Fleming (4 Ga., 115)."

The doctrine of laches depends upon the conduct of the plaintiff or the party against whom it is pleaded. The conduct of the defendant, as appears from the public laws and documents, of which the court takes judicial notice (Fourth National Bank v. Francklyn, 120 U. S., at p. 751; Mills v. Green, 159 U. S., at p. 657), has been one of notice to the world that she did not recognize the validity of these bonds and would not pay them. This has been done in the most solemn way, both by legislative acts beginning as early as 1870 and by amendment to her constitution in 1880. Of these public acts the Republic of Cuba is charged with notice. As hereinbefore stated, the principal of these bonds became due October 1, 1898, 18 years ago; the coupons matured each six months from October 1, 1868, and many of them are more than 40 years past due. What has prevented the Republic of Cuba since 1900 from appealing to the jurisdiction of this court to protect her property right in these bonds? Why so long delay?

"If it (the Government) comes down from its position of sovereignty and enters the domain of commerce, it submits itself to the same laws which govern individuals there." (Cooke v. U. S., 389, 398.)

The famous dictum of Lord Camden in Smith v. Clay (3 Brown Ch., 639, note, Amb., 645), that "nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence," has met with very general approval in many cases. No excuse is suggested in the declaration for the laches. The recognized doctrine of courts of equity to withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable length of time may be applied in the discretion of the court, even though the laches be not pleaded, or the bill demurred to. (Sullivan v. Portland, etc., R. Co., 94 U. S., 806, 811; Richards v. Mackall, 124 U. S., 183, 187, 188.)

The generally recognized and accepted doctrine that the State is a sovereign, that it possesses the immunity from suit except with its consent, possessed by all sovereigns, and the declaration in its constitution, hereinbefore quoted, that its supreme court may hear claims and make its recommendations to the legislature, but can enter no judgment—these facts constitute a statute of limitations as strong and as sweeping as can be enacted. We further submit that, considering the views expressed by Madison, Hamilton, Marshall, Webster, and also found in many opinions of this court, that those who deal in the obligations of the State must rely upon the good faith only of the State; it was the duty of the Republic of Cuba, as holder of the bonds of North Carolina, to move promptly by action in this court to enforce its alleged rights. The delay was not superinduced by any act of the State of North Carolina. If the Republic of Cuba relies upon the decision of this court in the South Dakota case as establishing her right to sue, and as making clear such right, then, as that decision was filed February 1, 1904, the Republic of Cuba offers no explanation of its delay for more than 12 years to act. Every bond described in the declaration and every coupon attached had then been past due and dishonored for more than five years. It is therefore insisted that the Republic of Cuba ought not to be permitted to institute an action against the State of North Carolina for the causes set forth in her declaration.

VII.

The court will not entertain the suit of the Republic of Cuba upon the causes of action stated in her declaration because this court would be without power to enforce its judgment against the State of North Carolina.

The authorities supporting, as we think, this position have already been cited, and our argument therefrom has been made in other parts of this brief, and we will not repeat them here.

The State of North Carolina, pursuant to the notice of the motion of the Republic of Cuba for leave to sue her, given to the governor of the State of North Carolina, most respectfully but most earnestly insists that the motion should be denied by this court.

T. W. BICKETT,
Attorney General of the State of North Carolina.
JAS. S. MANNING,
CAMERON MORRISON,
WILLIAM W. KITCHIN,
Of Counsel.

Mr. OVERMAN. I now ask that the resolution submitted by me be indefinitely postponed, as it has accomplished the object intended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before this resolution is finally disposed of, I desire to say just a word with reference to it. Constitutional construction grows up in a measure out of impressions as to what the Constitution means. I am unwilling to dispose of this resolution without expressing my dissent from any suggestion that under the Constitution any foreign Government can sue a State in the Supreme Court of the United States without the consent of the State or that the Supreme Court should entertain jurisdiction without the consent of the State. Upon that subject I read from Willoughby on the Constitution, page 1060:

Whether or not, if a suit were brought by a foreign State, it would be entertained by the Supreme Court is very doubtful. A foreign State could not, of course, be compelled to appear as a party defendant in such a suit, and reason would, therefore, seem to suggest that it should not be permitted to appear as a party plaintiff unless, of course, the defendant State should give its consent. Madison took this view: "I do not conceive," he said, "that any controversy can ever be decided in these courts between an American State and a foreign State without the consent of the parties. If they consent, provision is here made." Story, in his Commentaries, takes the same view. On the other hand, we have in the opinion of the Supreme Court rendered in the case of Hans v. Louisiana a dictum approving the dissenting opinion of Justice Iredell in Chisholm v. Georgia, according to which it was declared not to have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution to create any new remedies unknown to the law. From this it would follow that the Supreme Court could not take jurisdiction of a case between a foreign State and a State of the Union, even with the consent of both parties.

Thus it will be seen that Madison, Story, and Willoughby each declared that the consent of the State is required before the Supreme Court may entertain a suit by a foreign nation against a State.

I do not desire, Mr. President, to enter into any discussion of the principle here announced. I was only unwilling that we should pass from this question in silence as to the right of a foreign Government to bring a suit in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a claim, when the foreign Government really owned the claim against a State, without the consent of a State.

I desire, Mr. President, to join with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] in expressing my appreciation of the course just pursued by the Cuban Government.

My own State issued certain bonds that have been repudiated somewhat in the same situation as those repudiated by the State of North Carolina. They were issued in those unfortunate times just following the Civil War, when we had a nominal government, but not a real government. They were duplicate bonds, the first issue furnished to parties who were to buy them; not having been properly prepared and the second having been issued to take up the first, the parties retaining both. The State was able to follow the holders who were served with notice of the fact that both issues were not to be used, and the State only received money for one issue.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have asked that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the matter before the Senate at the present time is the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the resolution introduced by him be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado rise to the question raised by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understand the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina has been withdrawn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have asked that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to indefinitely postpone the resolution submitted by him.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Until that is disposed of, I do not care to take the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, but I merely want to say, in connection with what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has said, that, while I think, of course, it well enough to have put into the RECORD what he has said and the authority from which he quoted, I do not suppose it would make any difference what the Senate might think about the constitutional question raised by him. If it is true that no foreign Government can sue a State of this country without the consent of the State, of course the Supreme Court would take jurisdiction of that, and their opinion would settle it. I do not think it would be material what the opinion of the Senate was on the question, but, nevertheless, I think, as I have said, that it is well he put into the RECORD the matter that he did.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, of course, I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that the Senate is not now called upon to construe the Constitution on this subject. I premised my remarks with the statement that I did not wish to see this question pass from the Senate as if we were of the opinion that the jurisdiction did exist; and while we would not as a body construe it, I desired, so far as I was concerned, to place in the RECORD authorities of value against the right of action except where the State consented.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand, and I think the Senator did a very proper thing when he did it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 408, standing third on the calendar. It is the bill to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Newlands	Stone
Bankhead	Hollis	Norris	Thomas
Beckham	Hughes	Page	Thompson
Brady	Jones	Phelan	Tillman
Bryan	Kenyon	Pittman	Townsend
Chilton	Kern	Poindexter	Vardaman
Culberson	Kirby	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Cummins	Lane	Saulsbury	Walsh
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Watson
Dillingham	Lewis	Sheppard	Weeks
Fletcher	Lippitt	Shields	Works
Gallinger	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Harding	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Hardwick	Nelson	Sterling

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 408, the third bill on the calendar.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether this is a motion to proceed to the consideration of the water-power bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the object of the motion.

Mr. LANE. I want to say to the author of the motion that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has been trying here for months and weeks to have a hearing on his bill, and I feel that he is entitled to it. It is simply a matter of clear justice. For that reason I shall have to vote against the motion.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana stands in exactly the same situation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it is perhaps well for the Senate to understand——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is this motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at this time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand that the motion is not debatable after the morning hour?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill is not debatable during the first two hours of the session, until 2 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote, in the absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay." I wish to state that I had this transfer on a former vote and neglected to announce it, and I make this announcement for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. STONE. I have a general pair with that Senator. I have not been able to transfer it. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STONE. I transfer the pair I have with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to ask if the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. HARDING. Then, because of my general pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Brady	Kirby	Poindexter	Watson
Brandegee	Lippitt	Sherman	Weeks
Curtis	McCumber	Sterling
Gallinger	Nelson	Townsend
Kenyon	Norris	Wadsworth

NAYS—40.

Ashurst	Bryan	Fletcher	Hughes
Bankhead	Chilton	Hardwick	Johnson, S. Dak.
Beckham	Culberson	Hitchcock	Jones
Borah	Cummins	Hollis	Lee, Md.
Lewis	Phelan	Sheppard	Stone
Martin, Va.	Pittman	Shields	Swanson
Martine, N. J.	Pomerene	Simmons	Thomas
Newlands	Ransdell	Smith, Ariz.	Thompson
Overman	Robinson	Smith, S. C.	Vardaman

NOT VOTING—39.

Broussard	Goff	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Ga.
Catron	Gore	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Gronna	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Clapp	Harding	Myers	Sutherland
Clark	Husting	O'Gorman	Tillman
Colt	James	Oliver	Underwood
Dillingham	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Warren
du Pont	Kern	Penrose	Williams
Fall	La Follette	Reed	Works
Fernald	Lane	Saulsbury

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to inquire what is the motion now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is that of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to give notice that if the motion of the Senator from Montana is voted down, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4429) to amend the postal laws. I will state briefly that it is a bill to prevent the use of the mails for whisky advertising in States where advertisements of that character are prohibited.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in view of the anxiety displayed in the last few days to vote on a pending Executive nomination, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, pending the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, I ask leave to say that if the motion is agreed to, immediately after the Senate goes into executive session an effort will be made to have a day fixed when a vote upon the pending business before the Senate in executive session may be had. I make this statement in order that Senators may stay here.

Mr. GALLINGER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I rise to a point of order. I understand that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. STONE. It is not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I object to discussion on the floor.

Mr. STONE. It is through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made on the former vote as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote, because I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is not in his seat, and I have a pair with that Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Announcing the transfer of my pair as on the former vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). Being paired as heretofore stated, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer that I did on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. Announcing the same transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Clark	Kenyon	Poindexter	Townsend
Cummins	Lippitt	Sherman	Watson
Curtis	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
Gallinger	McCumber	Smoot	Works
Harding	Nelson	Sterling

NAYS—41.

Ashurst	Hollis	Phelan	Stone
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Swanson
Beckham	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Borah	Kirby	Ransdell	Tillman
Brady	Lane	Robinson	Underwood
Brandegee	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Bryan	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Chilton	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Walsh
Clapp	Newlands	Simmons
Culberson	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Fletcher	Overman	Smith, S. C.

NOT VOTING—33.

Broussard	Gore	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury
Catron	Gronna	Lewis	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Hardwick	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Colt	Hitchcock	Myers	Sutherland
Dillingham	Hughes	O'Gorman	Warren
du Pont	Husting	Oliver	Williams
Fall	James	Owen
Fernald	Johnson, Me.	Penrose
Goff	La Follette	Reed

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate do now adjourn, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. GOFF, is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer that I made before, I vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). Announcing the same pair as before, I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer that I did on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is recorded as having voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a general pair with that Senator and withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Massachusetts has not voted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Brandegee	Jones	Norris	Watson
Clapp	Kenyon	Poindexter	Weeks
Clark	Lippitt	Sherman

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on former votes and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on former votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as stated on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to say that I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on the main question. I do not know how he would vote on this motion if he were present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and will let my vote stand. While on my feet I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. BECKHAM. Announcing the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Bankhead	Kern	Ransdell	Swanson

So the motion of Mr. NEWLANDS was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After 3 hours and 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 6, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, whose love divine permeates all space and reflects itself in a thousand angles from the works of Thy hands and in the hearts of Thy children, and is the inspiration of all that makes life dear, cements the ties of friendship, makes home the dearest spot on earth, comforts the sorrowing, soothes the dying, renders hope immortal, promises eternal peace, increase, we beseech Thee, its power, widen its influence, until it becomes the crowning glory of humanity and brings heaven in all its fulness to the earth; and glory and honor and praise be Thine forever, in the name of Him who poured His love out on the Hill of Calvary that we might know Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives, had requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. BRANDEGEE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 190) to continue and extend the time for making report of the joint subcommittee appointed under a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," approved July 20, 1916, and providing for the filling of vacancies in said subcommittee.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture relating to the pecan industry in the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19359, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. HUTCHINSON rose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I remember it, when the committee rose yesterday a point of order was pending, made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the point of order was not made, but was reserved, so as to permit the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] to discuss further the potash amendment to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman from New Jersey would permit me to make a statement respecting this potash situation, somewhat in the nature of a correction of what I said yesterday?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, in detailing the progress in reference to the establishment of the potash plant along the Pacific coast, I fear that in one statement I inadvertently misled the committee. I said in that statement that little had been done in the way of actual work looking to the erection of a plant. I made that statement in view of certain testimony before the committee as to which I had not refreshed my memory since the testimony had been taken. At the moment I had in my pocket a letter which was sent to me by the Secretary of Agriculture, which I received while I was on the floor, and which I had not had the opportunity to even glance at.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is quite concerned about this item, but is unavoidably absent at the present time. If the gentleman is going to modify his statement of last night, I think it would be advisable to defer consideration of the item until the gentleman from Illinois returns.

Mr. LEVER. That is entirely satisfactory to me, and if the gentleman from New Jersey is willing, I shall ask unanimous consent to pass this item over temporarily.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to pass over this item temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

Salaries, Bureau of Entomology: One entomologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk and executive assistant, $2,250; 1 administrative assistant, $2,250; 1 financial clerk, $1,800; 3 clerks, class 4; 4 clerks, class 3; 10 clerks, class 2; 9 clerks, class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 4 clerks, at $900 each; 5 clerks, at $840 each; 2 entomological draftsmen, at $1,400 each; 1 entomological draftsman, $1,080; 4 foremen, at $1,080 each; 1 entomological preparator, $1,000; 4 entomological preparators, at $840 each; 8 entomological preparators, at $720 each; 7 entomological preparators, at $600 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $900 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 3 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 1 messenger boy, $480; 5 messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 mechanic, $1,080; 1 mechanic, $900; 1 mechanic, $840; 1 laborer, $600; 1 laborer, $540, 1 laborer, $480; 1 laborer, $420; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $102,680.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the item providing for an increase in the salary of the chief of the bureau from $4,500 to $5,000 a year.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know whether the gentleman can make any explanation which will persuade me to withdraw the point of order. I suppose it is the desire to lift up the chief of this bureau, so far as salary is concerned, and the one following it, to equal that of the chiefs of the other bureaus in the departments?

Mr. LEVER. That is one reason. Another reason is that the gentleman who is at the head of the Entomological Bureau of the department has been in the department for 38 years and is regarded by the country as probably the greatest entomologist in the world. There has been no increase in his salary since 1911. His name is Dr. L. O. Howard, and I presume the gentleman knows him personally.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance.

Mr. LEVER. He is a man of very great scientific ability and knowledge, and is looked upon in the country as one of the greatest men in his line of work in the world. The committee has felt for several years that his ability, capacity, and long service entitle him to this increase in salary.

Mr. ADAIR. How much increase is made in the bill over what he has been getting?

Mr. LEVER. Five hundred dollars. It puts him on an equality with most of the chiefs of the other bureaus, but it does not pay him any more than others.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salary would a scientist occupying a post in a professorial capacity at one of our universities receive for this character of work?

Mr. LEVER. I would say that a professor in charge of as large work as this in any great university or agricultural college—for instance, the director of an agricultural experiment station, or a man of that type—with as large responsibility in the way of administrative duties, coupled also with his scientific attainments, would command a salary of anywhere from $5,000 to $7,500 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman merely speaking haphazardly or based on actual information as to salaries paid to teachers in our universities, who occupy scientific positions?

Mr. LEVER. Let me illustrate. For instance, Dr. Galloway, formerly Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, was made dean of the agricultural college at Cornell University, at a salary of $7,500 a year. I am satisfied that his duties there were no more responsible than the duties of the gentleman who is at the head of this bureau. I recall another instance, that of Dr. Wood, who was at one time connected with the Bureau of Plant Industry, and who became dean of one of the western agricultural colleges at a salary of some $6,000 or $7,000. We pay in South Carolina the director of our experiment station, I think, $4,000. Of course his duties are not nearly so large as the duties of this gentleman, and the salaries in the South in our colleges are relatively very much smaller than they are in the West, and North, and East. My statement is not a guess at all, but is a statement based upon general information of the subject, without having the specific information at hand. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] would be a better judge of that than I am.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman would permit, I wanted to say that the salaries of university professors, college professors, are gradually increasing. Some 10 years ago $5,000 would have been regarded a salary for the head of a department. The salaries are increasing in all the big universities now. I want to ask whether the Government has not suffered various losses by having their expert men picked up out of the Government departments and taken to the various universities of the country?

Mr. LEVER. I can say emphatically that the Department of Agriculture suffers each year in the fact that the limitation upon the amount that may be paid to scientific men is fixed at $4,500 by the law, and we are losing good men almost every day, who are going either into the universities as teachers or heads of departments or into private business.

Mr. STAFFORD. How old is Dr. Howard?

Mr. LEVER. I take it that he must be a man 65 years old.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On page 52, line 8, in the place of the language stricken out on the point of order, insert "$4,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 8, in place of the point stricken out, insert "$4,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I see that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has come into the Hall, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to return to the potash item, on page 51, at the bottom of the page.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to the potash item, at the bottom of page 51. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in the statement which I made yesterday I probably gave the committee a somewhat erroneous impression of the situation with reference to the progress of the department in erecting a plant for the manufacture of potash as authorized by the current appropriation act. In my statement I used the following language, which does not quite represent the true situation:

The Secretary of Agriculture did not feel that with the information that he had at the time of making these estimates, or even at the time of the hearings on this bill, he was justified in spending very much of this money in the way of erecting a plant. He desires further time to look into the situation, and, therefore, he asks for the reappropriation of the funds provided for in the bill last year.

That statement is partly the facts represented before the committee, but it is not entirely the facts as stated before the committee, and I felt that in justice to myself I ought to say so. The truth about the matter is that in a letter addressed to the chairman of the committee, on page 320 of the hearings, the Secretary of Agriculture says this. I will read the letter for the benefit of the committee. It is addressed to me, and is as follows:

DECEMBER 7, 1916.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. LEVER: No estimate has been submitted for the operation of the experimental plant for the extraction of potash from kelp, which was authorized by the Agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917. Arrangements have been made for a certain degree of cooperation with one of the companies now operating on the coast, with the result that the expenses for operating the Government plant will be somewhat less than originally estimated. It will, for instance, be unnecessary for us to build or purchase a harvester at present, though ultimately this may become necessary if we decide to increase the output of the plant. A site has been secured which already contains a wharf. Some repairs will be necessary upon this, but it will not be necessary for us to build a wharf. Also we propose to start operations with 200 tons of wet kelp per day, ultimately going to 400 tons if it is apparent that more efficient operation can be carried on with the latter amount. Taking these things into consideration, together with the fact that until the plant is in actual operation it is extremely difficult to estimate the sum of money necessary for its operation, it seems wiser to defer a request for a further appropriation for operation until some time during the fiscal year 1918, when it is hoped that if it is necessary to secure additional funds to keep the plant in operation a definite statement of costs of operation can be presented. It is desirable, however, that such portion of the appropriation for the current fiscal year as remains unexpended on June 30, 1917, shall be reappropriated and made available until expended. To accomplish this it is requested that the following language be inserted in the bill:

"That so much of the appropriation of $175,000 made by the Agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917 for the investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale, including the establishment and equipment of such plant or plants as may be necessary therefor, as remains unexpended is hereby reappropriated and made available until expended for the purposes named."

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Now, the statement I made yesterday afternoon did not vary a great deal from that, and yet I fear it varied enough to mislead the committee, and in fairness to the committee I desired to read that statement. Now, in addition to that, if the gentleman will permit, on yesterday the Secretary of Agriculture sent me a letter inclosing a copy of a letter which he had addressed to Representative HUTCHINSON in reference to the potash situation and the progress of work under this item. While I was making my statement, this letter was in my pocket.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes further.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. This letter was in my pocket, but I had no opportunity to know what it was, and therefore I am going to read this statement into the RECORD:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 5, 1917.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

Dear Mr. LEVER: I am sending you herewith a copy of a letter which the Secretary has written to Representative HUTCHINSON regarding the appropriation of $175,000 for the investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale. You will note that one of the items is $12,000 for a harvester. When the bill was under consideration by the committee the department hoped to make arrangements for the purchase of wet kelp, which would make it unnecessary to purchase a harvester. Developments during the last few days indicate that satisfactory arrangements can not be made to secure the wet kelp needed in the operation of the plant. In the circumstances, arrangements have been made to secure a harvester.

Very truly, yours,

F. R. HARRISON, Private Secretary.

You will recall in the letter just read from the hearings a statement was made that a harvester would not be necessary.

Now, the letter to Representative HUTCHINSON, which he was about to read himself, and who has shown a great activity in this matter, reads as follows:

JANUARY 5, 1917.

Hon. E. C. HUTCHINSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HUTCHINSON: I have your letter of January 4, 1917, requesting information as to the amount expended of the appropriation of $175,000 for the investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale.

Up to December 31, 1916, the amount actually expended for salaries and travel under this item amounted to approximately $1,250. This figure can not be stated with absolute accuracy because certain travel expenditures have not as yet been audited. The figure given, however, is within a few dollars of the actual amount.

In addition, obligations have been incurred as follows: $12,000 for a harvester, $9,990 for three rotary driers, and $750 for repairs to the dock, making a total of obligations to date of $22,740.

Advertisements for bids on considerable additional machinery are at present outstanding, but since the dates for the opening of these bids have not as yet arrived, no statement of amounts in connection with these items can be made at present.

The work on this project is progressing as rapidly as possible. The plant is to be located at Summerland, Santa Barbara County, Cal., where a site has been secured, including a dock and railroad facilities. Plans for the building have been outlined, and, as indicated above, much of the machinery has either been secured or bids on it have been advertised for. We hope to start actual construction at Summerland by February 1, and unless unforeseen delays occur in the delivery of the machinery, expect to be operating within two months of that date.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

I understand, in private conversation with the young man in charge of the work, that the site was secured without cost to the Government. The letter is signed by Secretary Houston.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; but I wonder if the gentleman will let me complete my remarks.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is in connection with that inquiry.

Mr. LEVER. Very well. Go ahead.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the committee made any investigation as to whether the plans for the operation of a Government plant are along the lines of those carried on by private establishments? Is it merely going to be a supplemental plant to those already in existence, or is it along new lines?

Mr. LEVER. My understanding is that this plant will be erected in order to find out if it is possible to manufacture, on a commercial scale, potash in competition with German salts under normal conditions, and the plant, of course, is going to be relatively a rather small plant, as compared with some of the plants in operation out there at this time. I was about to continue my statement to show what plants are operating there at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman also information as to the plants operating elsewhere throughout the country?

Mr. LEVER. Not throughout the country, but of the plants manufacturing this kelp.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman information as to the number of plants that have been started throughout the country in the development of this industry?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as I know, there are no other plants operating in this country except those in connection with the manufacture of cement, the potash being a by-product in the manufacture of cement. No plants have been erected that I have knowledge of for the manufacture of potash alone.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can call the gentleman's attention here to one in my own city that has been established by private capital.

Mr. LEVER. Is it a cement factory?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not. I am surprised to see that the gentleman has not made inquiries along those lines.

Mr. LEVER. I will say very frankly to the gentleman that the Committee on Agriculture stated some years ago that the only hope of obtaining potash in this country—and we based our judgment upon the investigations of the department that had been conducted for four or five or six years—was through the giant kelp of the Pacific coast. It is probably true that, maybe, some potash can be had in connection with the manufacture of cement, but I do not believe we can have any very great hope of getting potash from that source. Possibly invention may find some way of giving us that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. We believe, however, that the giant kelp furnishes us with the real source of potash in this country if we can find a way to manufacture it cheaply enough to put it on a competitive basis with German salts.

Now, this morning I learned that there are eight plants on the Pacific coast at this time engaged in the manufacture of potash. The chief of these is the Hercules Manufacturing Co., which manufactures acetone to be used in the manufacture of munitions of war. This is a corporation capitalized at $2,000,000. They sell some of the potash obtained as a by-product for fertilizer, but the main purpose of the manufacture is to get the acetone to be used in the manufacture of munitions. There are several other plants, among them those of the Swift Co., the Simmons Co., the Diamond Match Co., and others. The latter company uses most of its potash in the manufacture of matches. These other companies are manufacturing potash now for fertilizer purposes, and are selling it for those purposes, but they are selling it at a price far above the normal price for potash, and unless we can develop some way of cheapening the processes it is the opinion of the expert in charge of this work, given to me this morning, that these plants can not manufacture potash in competition with the German salt under normal conditions.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does your information lead you to believe that when the munition demand is exhausted these same plants can go on and make potash alone without reference to munitions?

Mr. LEVER. Our information is that unless these plants very largely reduce their manufacturing costs and at the same time develop to the fullest capacity the value of the by-products of kelp—for example, iodine, ammonia, tars of the coal-tar variety, and combustible gas to be reused for the purposes of heat and fuel—unless they can very largely develop these by-products they can not compete with the German salt. It is the judgment, however, of the young man in charge of this—and he is not so young a man, either; he is about my age—that processes can be worked out by which the manufacturing costs can be largely reduced, and that processes can likewise be worked out by which full advantage may be had of the by-products which I have mentioned; and with those two things conspiring, we can manufacture potash and put it on the market and sell it under conditions in competition with German salt.

Now, gentlemen, that is the situation, except that the Secretary has reached the point where he has acquired the site, where he has acquired dockage, where he has made obligations for the purchase of a harvester, where he is practically in the course of erecting his plant. If the point of order should be pressed, we would find ourselves in the situation of having the plant on our hands. They can erect it between now and the first of the next fiscal year, but they would be without funds, probably, for operating, because what was left out of the fund for erecting the plant would have to go back into the Treasury. In that situation I wanted to urge upon my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], both as business men, that they do not press the point of order at this time.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Did I understand the gentleman to say a moment ago that it was reasonable to suppose that there would be enough potash developed from the manufacture of that kelp to supply the needs of the United States? Am I correct?

Mr. LEVER. No; but the testimony before the committee a year ago was to the effect that there was enough giant kelp on the Pacific coast to indefinitely supply our wants for potash if we can find a process by which it can be used in the trades. The giant kelp, as has been suggested to me by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY], is a plant that renews itself every three or four months.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I add to that that the supply of kelp in sight on the Pacific coast is sufficient to supply five times over the demand of the American market if a merchantable way is obtained for preparing it for market?

Mr. HICKS. How much do they consume per day in this country? Does anyone know?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. About 3,000 tons.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We have been using in this country 50 per cent of the German export, as I remember it.

Mr. LEVER. That is my recollection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not remember how much that is.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] think that a young man about his age, who has charge of this matter, spending the Government money, can compete with seven factories over there on the Pacific coast which are pushing the development of this industry? I notice Swift, amongst others, the great packing-house man.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Some of the most energetic and intelligent organizations in the United States, with vast wealth and vast enterprise, are experimenting in this matter. Now, does the gentleman think that with this appropriation and with this small factory, without any special skill, the Government should enter upon this experiment? What has been done? I gather and believe from what the gentleman has stated that these private concerns could give the Government cards and spades against any expenditure that the Government is prepared to make, and then win. Take that wicked organization, the Standard Oil Co., with its 2,000 by-products. Fortunes have been made, I have no doubt, but I think the Government might have had charge of the development of those by-products and the employment of chemists and the expenditure of money for a thousand years and not have made any such progress as the self-interest of intelligent people, commanding the best talent, with scores of the best chemists, has accomplished along those lines. I do not believe the Government, with its vast expenditures which are necessary in other directions, should embark upon an experiment of this kind, when I am led to believe that much more has been accomplished and is being accomplished on a large scale, without one cent of cost to the Government, by private enterprise.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Illinois will recognize the fact, however, that in this proposal here we are not undertaking any further appropriation of money. We are simply reappropriating what the last Congress appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, after all, the money can not be taken from the Treasury unless this appropriation is made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more, and then I hope we may close up this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Speaking of the Government making experiments along these lines, some years ago the Government of Japan undertook precisely this same proposition. The Government of Japan went into this experimentation and was so successful in finding a profitable way of producting potash from kelp, even before the war started, that about a year and a half ago there were more than 60 different plants in active operation in Japan engaged in the production of potash, probably there are more now.

Mr. CANNON. By the Government?

Mr. LONGWORTH. As the result of the discoveries in Government experiment stations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman believe those Japanese Government experiments are available and at the command of private concerns who may desire to make use of the information?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not, if there are these 60 plants engaged in the manufacture in Japan?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think if the gentleman should undertake to try to find out the secret methods employed in the operation of those plants, or any of them, he would have very great difficulty.

Mr. LEVER. Another thing, Mr. Chairman, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]; if the gentleman's line of reasoning were applied to all Government activities, it would practically close down all Government experimental and investigational work. The Department of Agriculture is built upon the theory that the Government has a duty to conduct certain investigations and experiments which the private individual ordinarily is not able to conduct. The department has been built up on that theory. Many of the other departments of the Government have been built up on that theory. We created a Bureau of Mines, whose purpose was to see if we could relieve the condition of the miner and to investigate mining problems. We set our experts at work upon that proposition, and although men had been mining for thousands of years, and men of great capital had long been engaged in the enterprise, yet our Government experts discovered appliances which are now used to safeguard the lives and health of the men who work under the ground. My own theory about this differs very materially from that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I think the Government has a large duty to perform in all of these matters, and the Department of Agriculture has grown from a mere desk and a few chairs into a great, constructive organization, whose whole purpose is the working out of these difficult problems which the average man has neither the scientific capacity nor the money to work out for himself.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. With pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Am I correct in my understanding that each of these individual enterprises has its own secret process, and that the only method by which the general public could ever be made familiar with the process of utilizing kelp is through the agricultural station of the Government?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Texas brings out a very good point. If we discover anything through these investigations in the way of cheapening the process or in the way of greater utility of the by-products, those discoveries will likely be patented in the name of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman sure about that? In the Bureau of Mines we discovered a process that was not patented in the interest of the Government but patented in the interest of the man who made the discovery, who is now trying to hold up the Government.

Mr. LEVER. That man ought to be kicked out of the service.

Mr. MANN. We are talking about passing a bill to recognize him.

Mr. LEVER. I am not familiar with those facts.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The instance cited by the gentleman from Illinois shows that Congress is remiss in not passing a law to prevent that sort of thing.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is correct also. I trust my two friends from Illinois [Mr. CANNON and Mr. MANN], for whom I have very high regard, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], for whom I have equal regard, will not press this point.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON], who probably knows more about this subject than anybody else on the floor, may be permitted to address the committee for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] be allowed 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am in hopes that the gentleman from Wisconsin will not press this point of order. I think this is one of the most important matters before Congress in the interest of the farmer and of the consumer. When this appropriation was before Congress on April 26 I endeavored to give the statistics of four of the largest crops, and to show the great benefit that potash had been in the increase of those crops. I also at that time made a prediction that if there was not some means of getting potash we would see a large depreciation in the crops.

I have taken the years of 1916 and 1915 for a comparison of the crops. I am not going to give you the entire figures, but only the results of four of these crops.

In 1916 the crop of potatoes was 73,666,000 bushels less than that of 1915, or a decrease of 15.1 bushels per acre. In corn the loss was 471,294,000 bushels, or 3.8 bushels per acre. In wheat the loss was 371,699,000 bushels, or 4.8 bushels per acre. In oats the decrease was 288,370,000 bushels, or 7.7 bushels per acre.

That is the way it was all along the line. Take the statistics of cotton and you will find the same results. I do not claim that potash is entirely the cause of the loss, but it is an important factor, because the weather conditions and other elements come into the final result. As I said, potash is one of the most important things to improve our soil. When you get your farm into a high state of cultivation by the use of potash, it has a great deal to do with preventing them from being injured by the elements of the weather and diseases that attack our crops.

We read a great deal about the high cost of living. A day or two ago I heard on the floor of the House some one accuse the bakers of the high cost of bread. It is not the farmer; it is not the miller; it is not the baker, or anyone else; it is the depreciation of our crops that causes the high cost of living. I claim that this Government can do no better work than to experiment upon the resources whereby we can get maximum crops.

I have taken a good deal of trouble to go to the Bureau of Soils, and I had a lengthy talk with Dr. Whitney, the chief, and he informs me that we have lots of potash in this country besides that on the great Pacific coast, and while they are experimenting there they are experimenting in other lines. We have large manufactories that have by-products that will produce all the potash the Government needs outside of the Pacific coast. It is only a small amount of private capital that can afford to go to the Pacific coast to get potash for the benefit of the farmer. All through the Eastern States there is no potash coming from the Pacific coast. One concern in Nebraska is making potash from a lake. It made a contract for $3.50 a unit or per cent of potash, but the price has gone to $6 a unit or per cent of potash. That is 10 times the normal price and they can not sell you much at that price. It is impossible to get potash from the Pacific coast unless it is by some concern like Swift & Co., or some large firm that has money to go out there. The eastern farmer and some of the Middle West can not get potash at any price.

Now, it is said that after the war the price will go down. Well, Germany knows the price of potash in this country, and it knows the demand for it; it knows that we can not get along without it, and unless we get some help from the Government so that we can get our potash at a reasonable cost we will pay the price.

I am not going to talk to you much longer, as the chairman, Mr. LEVER, has given you the letter that I received from the department saying that they have already obligated and made arrangements for the great part of the money and plant, and all that they have done will be useless unless we have this appropriation continued. As I said, a part of the experiment on the Pacific coast is a small affair in my judgment. We use in normal times 3,000 tons a day, and in the first place the matter of freight will make it so high that it will be impossible to get it East, and also to some parts of the West. We have got to get potash from some other source than that of the Pacific coast. It will help out in that section, but it is impossible to keep our land in a high state of cultivation unless we get other means for producing potash at a reasonable price.

If anyone will compare these figures that I have given between the crops of 1916 and 1915, they will see that we have to do something, and if we do not do something soon our depreciation is going to be on the same lines the next season. I think it is a great mistake to bar the people of this country from this appropriation when it will do so much good. [Applause.]

HIGH COST OF LIVING AND SOME OF THE CAUSES.

Mr. Chairman, on April 21 of last year, when the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture was under consideration, there was an amendment offered to appropriate $175,000 for the purpose of determining the best method of obtaining potash in the United States on a commercial scale.

I endeavored at that time to impress on Congress the importance of potash as a factor in growing crops, and gathered statistics on the four important crops covering the last 25 years, to show the gradual increase in production due almost entirely to the use of potash.

I made the prediction at that time that if some means were not found to furnish potash for agriculture purposes we would very soon see a great depreciation in the yield and quality of our food crops.

All countries are concerned over the same question and are spending considerable time and large sums of money to devise ways and means to make the farms produce maximum crops.

The use of potash has been restricted by the European war, and as a result we see an enormous falling off in crop yields for the last year.

To verify this statement I will give the figures for 1915 and 1916:

Years.	Acres.	Bushels.	Bushels per acre.
POTATOES.
1915	3,761,000	359,103,000	95.5
1916	3,550,000	285,437,000	80.4
Loss		73,666,000	15.1
CORN.
1915	108,321,000	3,054,535,000	28.2
1916	105,954,000	2,583,241,000	24.4
Loss		471,294,000	3.8
WHEAT.
1915	59,898,000	1,011,505,000	16.9
1916	52,785,000	639,806,000	12.1
Loss		371,699,000	4.8
OATS.
1915	40,789,000	1,540,362,000	37.8
1916	41,539,000	1,251,992,000	30.1
Loss		288,470,000	7.7

Every one of the above crops shows a severe loss, and while I admit that weather and other conditions have had some effect, yet nearly the entire loss, especially in the potato crop, can be charged to the lack of potash.

Prof. Arthur Richmond Marsh, a noted economist and scholar, speaking on the same subject, states that fertilizers are necessary to intensive agriculture, and that in view of the inability of Germany to secure sufficient manurial elements the crops of that country will be cut almost in half this year.

He predicts that the potato crop will be less than 30,000,000 tons, as compared with the normal crop of 50,000,000 tons. That there will be a reduction of at least one-third in the grain crops and fully one-half in the production of milk, butter, and meat because of the lack of feeds and fodders for the animals.

To avoid just this condition in our country the Department of Agriculture has been working under this appropriation endeavoring to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale, so that it can be produced at a price that will not be prohibitory to its use for agricultural purposes, and at the same time make us independent of all other nations for our supply.

Just how much the department has accomplished is shown by the following letter I received from the Hon. David Franklin Houston, Secretary of Agriculture:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 5, 1917.

Hon. E. C. HUTCHINSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HUTCHINSON: I have your letter of January 4, 1917, requesting information as to the amount expended of the appropriation of $175,000 for the investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale.

Up to December 31, 1916, the amount actually expended for salaries and travel under this item amounted to approximately $1,250. This figure can not be stated with absolute accuracy because certain travel expenditures have not as yet been audited. The figure given, however, is within a few dollars of the actual amount.

In addition, obligations have been incurred as follows: $12,000 for a harvester, $9,990 for three rotary driers, and $750 for repairs to the dock; making a total of obligations to date of $22,740. Advertisements for bids on considerable additional machinery are at present outstanding, but since the dates for the opening of these bids have not as yet arrived no statement of amounts in connection with these items can be made at present.

The work on this project is progressing as rapidly as possible. The plant is to be located at Summerland, Santa Barbara County, Cal., where a site has been secured, including a dock and railroad facilities. Plans for the building have been outlined, and, as indicated above, much of the machinery has either been secured or bids on it have been advertised for. We hope to start actual construction at Summerland by February 1, and unless unforeseen delays occur in the delivery of the machinery expect to be operating within two months of that date.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the department should be encouraged in their work and the appropriation continued, for I am of the opinion that one of the best means of reducing the high cost of living and making our country self-sustaining is to do everything possible to put farming and marketing on a scientific basis.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not profess any degree of expertness in this question, although I have given it some attention and have seen something about the situation on the California coast. My interest in it lies because it is the foundation of my political belief that everything which is a necessity in the everyday life in the American people which can be produced in this country, having due regard for the climate, ought to be produced here. [Applause.]

Of course, we will never be able to supply the American people with tea, coffee, or rubber, and things of that sort. But where it is possible in this country to produce a necessity of life it should be produced here.

The great importance of potash, and of this particular item, is that it is one of the two materials upon which we are absolutely dependent on another country for our supply. This country has never been self-sustaining either in dyes or in potash. We have a beautiful example to-day of what our failure to be able to provide the people with these two necessities of life is costing them. The records show that in the case of dyes, which before the war averaged about 21 cents a pound, the American people are now compelled to pay as high in some cases as $21 a pound, an increase of 10,000 per cent in a necessity of life. The rise in potash has not been so remarkable, but it has gone up, if my information is correct, from about 2 cents a pound to more than 20 cents a pound, an increase of over 1,000 per cent. The question that confronts us in the potash matter is not, it seems to me, whether we have arrived at a state where we can produce potash in commercial quantity but rather whether we are not justified in expending not only $175,000 but infinitely more if by any possibility we can arrive at a method of producing potash in this country at such a price and in such quantity as will enable us to supply the American people. We have experimented in many ways. We have sought to find potash in the soil, in mines, in certain kinds of rock, and in various other ways. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] yesterday spoke of a project in his district to produce potash out of a certain deposit, if I remember correctly, in the beds of what were formerly lakes; but let me call the attention of this House to this fact, that if we can find a commercial method of producing potash from kelp, we will have found a method of producing potash from an article that will never die out. Even though we should find certain deposits in the soil, they will exhaust themselves in time, but if we can produce potash from kelp, then we will have an inexhaustible supply, for not only is there sufficient kelp in sight, the potash content of which is sufficient to supply the American market to-day four or five times over, but that kelp, if properly harvested, will reproduce itself anywhere from two to three times a year. Therefore, the supply is inexhaustible.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. RANDALL. In connection with the growth of kelp, it was brought to my attention yesterday that the fields in the vicinity of Long Beach, Cal., have already been mown over by a number of plants in that vicinity, and they have now gone across to Catalina Island to get further crops, with the expectation that the Long Beach fields will again be ready for harvest in two or three months.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that it will be seen what a marvelous advantage this country will have, because it is the only country outside of Japan that has these enormous kelp fields. These fields stretch from Alaska to San Diego, Cal. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] says that they are producing potash in some of these plants, but that the price is so high on account of the war that there is no incentive to find out the best and most economical method not only of production but of the utilization of the various by-products that come from the production of potash. The only facts that we do know are these, that a ton of wet kelp, or a unit of wet kelp, when dried, will produce about 20 per cent, in round figures, of its content in dry kelp.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. I will ask the gentleman if he knows how many places in the United States kelp is found?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Only on the Pacific coast.

Mr. JACOWAY. Is it not found in Maine?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not this particular quality of kelp. The giant kelp, which alone has a substantial potash content, is found only on the Pacific coast. This dry kelp will produce anywhere from 10 to 30 per cent of pure potash. We know what we have, but we have not yet developed a means of producing it successfully from a commercial standpoint, particularly in competition with the potash that Germany produces, which is a product of the mine.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is not that the real crux in the whole matter, that not being able to produce it in such quantity as to be of commercial value now, if the war closes these private plants may close down because there is no profit in it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably.

Mr. FESS. Whereas a Government plant could continue to make its investigations to find out what we do not know?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Entirely so, and now is the time to do it, it seems to me.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is not the dry kelp itself a good thing for the fields?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Dry kelp is used now as a fertilizer.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Then what is the necessity for an expensive process of extracting potash?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, the potash salts are very much more valuable than the dry kelp, are used for many objects other than fertilizing, and can be very much more easily transported.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I think we all realize the great importance of this potash question, and as the gentleman is versed in the matter, I will ask him this. We hear rumors from time to time of deposits being discovered here and there. Why is it that we do not mine those deposits? Is it because the rumors are exaggerated, or because it costs too much?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is because the rumors are not true. They never have discovered potash deposits in this country, and probably there is no one here, except possibly as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] pointed out, who knows of any deposits.

Mr. HICKS. Two or three months ago we heard of one being discovered in Cuba.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The fact remains that the world to-day is dependent upon one country, practically one syndicate, in Germany, for the entire supply of potash, and that syndicate can dictate the total amount to be exported and can absolutely fix the price, and while the price was only 2 cents a pound, as I remember it, before the war, after the war is over, there being no competition whatever in this country, and because of the fact that we must have potash, Germany will be able to dictate the price absolutely, and it is entirely possible that we may be compelled to pay four or five times the amount we paid before the war for our potash.

At any rate, we are entirely in their hands, and they can do as they please, just as they can do as they please in the manufacture of dyes unless the protective duty established in the Kitchin bill will result, as I very much hope it will, in building up a substantial industry in this country. But with dyes and potash we have been absolutely at the mercy of another country, and furthermore, as it has been most disastrously proved, when we are deprived of that supply the American people have had to pay anywhere between 1,000 and 10,000 per cent increase on absolute articles of daily necessity.

Now, climatically, we can produce dyes in this country with a protective tariff; climatically, we can produce potash in this country if we will investigate and discover proper chief methods of producing.

Mr. CANNON. What is the duty on potash now?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think potash is free, but I am not certain.

Mr. CANNON. But it is on the dyes that there is protection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me just there, if potash should remain on the free list, with the great supply in Germany and the cheap freights, how long does he think a duty would remain on potash?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I am not able to say what, if any, duty would be placed on potash.

Mr. CANNON. It would not have as much chance as a dog in high rye.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman this: That if we have an industry in this country, a live industry, I believe in protecting it; but so far as potash is concerned we have a dead industry, and I do not believe in protecting it. I do believe in developing to the point where it will become a live industry, and then, if necessary, I believe in protecting it. But we have an asset here in this country of potash. We have a bed of kelp, reproducible two or three times a year, which stretches thousands of miles along one of our coasts. We have gone far enough in the experimentation to find out that it contains five times the amount of potash used to-day in this country. Let us suppose that we develop that bed. Let us suppose that we had here five times the necessary supply, do you not suppose that we would use this potash on fields where we never think of using it now? Do you not suppose that would immensely decrease the cost of many articles of daily necessity? Why, gentlemen, to me it seems there is no argument against this proposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is no question, I presume, that American agriculture is rightly more interested in than in the supply and cost of fertilizers, and I am not going to antagonize for a moment any effort on the part of the Agricultural Department to develop a supply of cheap potash. I do not believe their effort in the end will become successful along present lines of effort. I want to point out the fact that the one universal supply of fertilizers for the farmers of America is the animal industry in this country. In this connection I am forced to add that for more than 10 years the animal industry in this country has been steadily declining. During this period we have been annually exporting vast quantities of agricultural foodstuffs from American farms over the seas and into Germany. There has been more potash sent in the oil cake and other food products of the soil off American farms and sold to the German people to feed their live stock than we have ever imported from Germany to go upon our own farms. There is not one acre of corn out of every hundred grown in the United States that receives a handful of potash fertilizer upon it. My friend from New Jersey, Mr. HUTCHINSON, has discussed the corn crop of 1915 and 1916, in relation to the shortage of potash fertilizers. I can not see the important sequence. I doubt if there were a thousand acres of corn in the Mississippi Valley which received a handful of potash fertilizer during the years 1915 and 1916.

Now, the practical thing about it is this: Germany has enough potash to supply the whole world, not only for one year but probably for hundreds of years to come. That supply has always fixed a price at which this product would sell in the markets of the world. They have never attempted to put a prohibitive price on it, because such a policy would kill the goose that lays the golden egg for that nation. It is easy to make predictions, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has attempted the rôle of a prophet; but I think it will be safe to assume that after the war is over commercial practices will follow the old lines, and if they can produce potash cheaper than we can, they will put a commercial price on the commodity which will command our markets. The only possible way to prevent this result would be to levy a high import duty. This action would result in high prices to the American farmer, and would justly merit the opposition of the American farmer. In the end, if we can buy our potash cheaper in Germany than in America, we will buy it there or else levy a tax on the food supply of our Nation. A more rational national policy will be to feed the foods we are now sending away and which are being wasted on the American farms to food-producing animals and thereby increase the live-stock industry. Such a policy would place upon every farm a supply of fertilizer that is in reality costing no man anything, and that is not being imported from other countries. I do not believe that it is possible that American agriculture can be continued indefinitely in the future; that it will be possible to keep up the soil fertility in the United States except it is done on the basis of live-stock industry in the United States.

One great mistake is that we have been a pioneer Nation and have projected our development with small regard to the building up of scientific agriculture. It has been an agriculture that has been based largely upon the selling of raw agricultural products and the farmer buying back his finished products. Naturally, we have not had the same degree of national success in agriculture that we have attained in manufacturing and in almost every other line of American industry. In fact, the only line of industry that has engaged the American thought for any length of time in which we appear at a disadvantage when compared with the other nations of the world is that of agriculture, and this is very largely due to the fact that we have not builded our agriculture on the firm foundation of live stock, which is the only safe basis for any permanent agricultural industry. I will go further and assert that it is the only way agricultural industry has ever survived in any old country or ever will enjoy permanent prosperity in any country. There are more sheep pasturing in the parks of the city of London itself than you will find in almost any of the counties in any of the great grain-growing States of the United States. There are more sheep being pastured per acre in Great Britain than probably in any one State of the American Union, notwithstanding the fact of the high prices of this land as compared with ours. There are more sheep and cattle in Scotland than there are practically in a like area in the United States. And so we continue selling off our farms—selling oil cake to go to Germany, or did go there before the war, to feed their flocks and their herds. Thus we deplete wantonly the very fertility that you are saying here you want to conserve and to develop. The potash in our farm crops which we export is just as valuable to the Nation as any which may be manufactured from the kelp beds of the Pacific.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. Just one word in regard to the potash supply of Germany, and then I will yield. All they have to do in Germany to secure this product is to mine the potash and bring it to the surface, as cheaply as we would mine rock salt in this country, and the freight from Germany here would be less than the freight from the Pacific coast to Washington. There will not be a time in the life of any living man probably when it will be possible for us to ship potash from the Pacific coast to the farms in the Mississippi Valley, certainly not to the farms east of the Allegheny Mountains, as cheaply as it can be freighted here from Germany.

So the question is, If it will cost more to transport it across the American continent than it will cost to transport it from Germany, we come back to the competition between the cost of producing it here and the cost of producing it in Germany, and, in my opinion, the advantage will remain with Germany. I would not have mentioned this if it had not been that my friend from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] spoke about the shrinkage in our agricultural crops and attempted to make it appear, by inference at least, that the lack of the potash supply was probably largely responsible for our present unfortunate deficiency in principal farm crops. I know enough about scientific agriculture to know that potash is one of the necessities for plant life. I know enough about practical agriculture to know that there are very few farmers who use it for the fertilizing of our great staple crops; and I know enough more about the subject to know that there is not one farmer in a thousand who has put a ton of potash on his land in the last 10 years for the fertilizing of corn or wheat anywhere in the Mississippi Valley but what has lost money on the first cost of doing it, except in very limited areas of muck lands, which are deficient in this element. And that statement rests not only upon my assertion, but it will be verified by the cost sheets from any practical farmer in the great grain-producing sections of the United States.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Indiana, however, realizes that all of the great Atlantic belt, from Maine to Florida, in the production of vegetables, potatoes, and cotton is almost absolutely dependent upon its supply of potash.

Mr. MOSS. That is true, and I want to say further to my friend from South Carolina that I recognize the fact that in trucking and in special lines of agriculture they have used artificial commercial fertilizer to advantage, and always will, and the more highly you develop the land, the more potash and other elements of commercial fertilizers you will use; but I am speaking particularly now about the great farm crops that go to make the basic crops of American agriculture in the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOSS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is a large farmer himself?

Mr. MOSS. I would not say I am a large farmer, but I am a farmer.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman works a large farm, but says he is not a large farmer. The gentleman's whole business as a farmer is based on the raising of cattle, is it not? That is the principal thing.

Mr. MOSS. It is based upon live stock in a mixed animal husbandry.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has recently bought 1,600 acres of land in my State for the purpose of using it for grazing cattle? I understood him to say so in a conversation the other day.

Mr. MOSS. Does not the gentleman believe it is a good purchase?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do; but I wondered whether the gentleman's attitude as between commercial fertilizer and cattle fertilizer was absolutely impartial. I do not say it is not, but I wanted the gentleman's position as a matter of fact to lay before the House. The gentleman says that the farmers do not make any profit in using potash.

Mr. MOSS. On general farm crops.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But as to the possibility of that, may I narrate just briefly what I did?

Mr. MOSS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I offered a prize to the boys in my county for the one who would raise the most corn on an acre. A boy took an acre which had been declared to be almost worthless a few years ago and put it into corn. The average corn yield in our county that year, I believe, was 57 bushels, or something like that—something short of 60 bushels—and he raised approximately 130 bushels on that acre. He gave as the principal reason for it the scientific use of potash fertilizer as taught in the agricultural school in that county. Of course, he tended it carefully and worked it well.

Mr. MOSS. In reply to my friend from Wisconsin I want to say that I am very friendly to boy-club farming, but I am somewhat familiar with the way in which it is carried on. The boy is given an acre of ground on which to grow corn, and he selects the very best acre on his father's farm, and is charged a rental of, say, $5; while if you put that acre on a commercial basis, probably the rental would be worth $25 or $30. So we get a low cost price. This small area of selected ground is given especial care and cultivation, resulting in exceptional yield. Then we wonder why the average in the United States is only about 28 bushels an acre. I am making that statement simply by way of illustration; but I do not believe there has been a bushel of wheat or a bushel of corn raised in the Mississippi Valley for 10 years, where a man has put any considerable quantity of commercial fertilizer on the land, without doing it at a loss. I recognize the fact that a good many people buy commercial fertilizer year after year, just as there are people who buy a great many other things that they ought not to buy, and upon which they do not make a profit; but I am speaking of the man who keeps a cost account and is able to give an intelligent account of the results of his fertilizer. This statement is not based on my mere assumption. For a number of years before I became too busy I had the pleasure of running a farm experiment station in collaboration with Purdue University. The land was measured and an accurate account of labor, fertilizers, and yields was kept, and received the attention of the experts of the university. After the harvest the accounts were audited to see whether we made anything from the application of fertilizers.

In some instances we applied fertilizer without any profit whatever, but in the majority of cases at an absolute loss. In general, during the years that are past, the man to make a profit in American agriculture is one of two classes, either he who purchased virgin land at a low price or the man who has gone into an intelligent live-stock rotation farming and has been able to keep up his farm fertility through the by-products.

Now, one word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. The only reason that I went to northern Wisconsin to buy land was because I bought it for less than it was worth. If the State had an intelligent land policy, instead of selling land in blocks of 1,600 acres at a nominal price per acre, land that will probably soon sell for $100 an acre, the State should acquire ownership in trust for future generations. The land should be broken up into small tracts so as to be able to sell it to a man with small capital. The State should go further, and should partly develop the land before selling it to the settler, so as to enable the homeseeker to commence raising crops at once, and should give him ample time to pay for the land out of the products of the land. Such a policy would develop productive agriculture and it would do something toward helping men now landless and homeless to become independent home-owning agricultural citizens.

The greatest national endeavor during the present decade is on the reclamation lands in the West, where the Government experts take worthless land and have made it productive, and by so doing have made it possible for a man to purchase it and to commence making a living at once. If the State of Wisconsin would purchase the 10,000,000 acres in cut-over lands now vacant in that State and would make a reasonable appropriation by which it could be brushed, fenced, and made possible for the magnificent live-stock agriculture that is going to be developed and sell such improved lands at actual cost to the people of this country that are landless, sell it to those who would be willing to buy 40 or 80 acres and give them ample time to pay for it in small annual installments, it would be a great beneficence to the State and to the Nation.

But what are you doing? First, the Government sold the land to great lumber corporations for a trifle; lands which yielded from five to ten thousand board feet of lumber per acre. They have cut off these magnificent forests and have accumulated colossal fortunes. The slash was permitted to lie on the ground, inviting destructive conflagration. No seed trees were permitted to stand so as to insure reforestation. Forest fires have ravaged large areas, destroying all valuable young timber, and have made this immense area a veritable desert—it has been reduced by such a stupid economic policy so as to be almost worthless for years to come. The State now, as if in revenge, is imposing onerous taxes and thereby compelling these corporations to beg men to come in and buy it. True, they are selling it to them in its present worthless condition for much higher prices than they originally paid for it. That is the situation in northern Wisconsin. I have only taken advantage of the opportunity. It is not a reflection on the man that buys these lands; it is a reflection on the State that permits such a sale of them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. Yes.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if his State, with the exception of New York and Pennsylvania, does not use more fertilizer than any other State in the Union?

Mr. MOSS. Unfortunately we have some poor land in the counties in the southern part of our State, and it is in that portion of the State where the great bulk of the fertilizer is sold and used.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order when the paragraph was first read, and last evening the chairman of the committee gave us the information, or led the committee to believe, that the department had not launched at all into the purchase of machinery or manufacturing facilities, but said that the head of the department had virtually discouraged the continuation of this experimental plant.

Mr. LEVER. I think I did not go that far.

Mr. STAFFORD. It led me to believe that that was the position of the Secretary; but this morning he has presented information of a different character, which shows that the work is already started. I question very much whether anything whatever is going to come from this experiment. The hearings before the committee confirm that; but, Mr. Chairman, having launched into what I regard as a wasteful experiment, having contracted an expenditure of $30,000 or $40,000, I do not intend to press the point of order except upon that part which makes this a continuing appropriation. If the gentleman from South Carolina is willing to strike out the words "and made available until expended," I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, Mr. Chairman, with that understanding, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, on line 3, page 52, after the word "reappropriated," strike out the balance of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, after the word "reappropriated," in line 3, strike out the words "and made available until expended."

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the phrase "for the purposes named" will carry the limitation carried in last year's appropriation act?—

Provided, That the product obtained from such experimentation may be sold at the market price of such product, and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. LEVER. I should think so. The amendment is to strike out, after the word "reappropriated," in line 3, page 52, the words "and made available until expended."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting cereal and forage crops, including a special investigation of the Hessian fly and the chinch bug, $123,260.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In each of the three items there is an increase in the appropriations over last year, in some instances running up to 25 per cent or more. I would like to inquire what is the occasion for the inordinate increase in these items.

Mr. LEVER. The item which precedes the one which has just been read has been increased $17,600. The purpose of that is to enlarge the work of the Bureau of Entomology on chestnut weevils and miscellaneous nut insects, $2,600; and, second, to put a field laboratory in the Ozark Mountain region in Arkansas for the study of fruits; third, to establish a field station in one of the New England States for work in connection with the apple-tree tent caterpillar, a very destructive insect, $8,000; and to enlarge the work on insecticide, $2,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, in order to understand the manner in which these appropriations are increased, we can generally assume they are for the purpose of providing for the establishment of experimental stations such as indicated by the gentleman in the instance referred to?

Mr. LEVER. Not necessarily for that purpose, but sometimes for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the phraseology is broad enough to permit the establishment of an experiment station, then the committee will not refer to it as a special item in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. But, if it is not broad enough, then the committee adopts the policy of informing the House of this special work?

Mr. LEVER. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Leaving the Committee of the Whole in the dark completely as to the activities of the department when they establish new experiment stations, such as in the Ozark Mountains and in New England?

Mr. LEVER. We think we have a pretty good check upon that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the check?

Mr. LEVER. The information which the committee itself possesses.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the House has no such check.

Mr. LEVER. The House has it in the report of the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the House is not acquainted with the report.

Mr. LEVER. It ought to be.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman knows that every Member of the House does not examine each report that is filed.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman will realize that the Agricultural Department, for instance, in the case of the Weather Bureau, has some 200 field stations which are not set out in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman will realize in that particular——

Mr. LEVER. Oh, the gentleman will permit me to complete my statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I do not know myself offhand how many stations for carrying on experimental work are carried in the Department of Agriculture, but I do not think I would miss the guess very far if I were to say five or six hundred, or even a thousand; and probably 1,000 would be too little; but where the work is small, where what we call a field station is established, which is not permanent, which is not going to be there forever, but is to last for a couple of years for the purpose of studying some peculiar situation in a certain section of the country and which will be moved to some other section later on, we do not set it out. If we are to establish a station that is to be a permanent station, with overhead expenses, the committee has always adopted the policy of providing specifically for it in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the station to be established in the Ozark Mountains a permanent station?

Mr. LEVER. No; that will be a station to study the situation there until they have found out what the situation is, and then it will be removed to some other section of the country to study similar conditions there.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will recognize that it is hardly a parallel instance to cite the appropriations for the Weather Bureau, because he knows that when we establish additional Weather Bureau stations we always provide for specific appropriations authorizing the establishment of the particular weather bureau.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that. What we do when we establish a permanent Weather Bureau station is this: We make a specific appropriation when we establish a permanent weather bureau, but where we appropriate in the general expense fund we always carry sufficient to pay for the rent of the station where the station is located on a rental basis. Whenever there is a permanent proposition that amounts to anything at all we set it out in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give the committee the reason for the increase in the appropriation of $10,000 in the paragraph following?

Mr. LEVER. That sum is to be used in further and more aggressive prosecution of the studies of the department, with a view to handling the Hessian fly situation. That question has been studied for many years, but the destructive effects of that fly are so great, amounting to as much as the loss of $1,000,000,000, it is estimated, in some wheat crops, that the committee felt we ought to grant the increase asked by the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. And as to the item in the following paragraph of $10,000, an increase respecting the cigarette beetle?

Mr. LEVER. We have not yet reached that item.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; but I thought I would get the information while I am on my feet.

Mr. LEVER. We are increasing that appropriation by $10,000, for the purpose of enlarging the experiment with reference to the boll weevil in the South.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the cigarette beetle? Is that the microbe that affects the human species, which makes them cigarette fiends?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know about that. Something must make the fiends. This is a little insect that punctures a cigar. The gentleman will frequently find his cigar with a whole in it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, etc., and the cigarette beetle and Argentine ant, $74,400.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WILSON of Louisiana: Page 53, line 22, after the first comma, strike out the figures "$74,400" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$89,400."

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the chairman of the committee has just explained that there has been an increase of $10,000 to assist in the boll-weevil investigation, I desire to make a statement to explain why this increase is asked.

It grows out of certain interesting developments made at the boll-weevil laboratory down at Tallulah, La., in 1916, in which there have been some very striking results, presenting the most encouraging situation that has been developed since the boll-weevil investigation began in 1904. The agents of this bureau and also the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology have stated that with the increase of $15,000 these investigations may be carried out and exhaustively made in such a degree that if the results are for 1917 as they have been during 1916, and when the experiments are made on a larger scale, they will be ready to release the result of these tests to the planters of the cotton districts, and by doing so it would increase cotton production something like, on the basis of a crop like 1916, 1,000,000 bales, assuming that future operations will be in keeping with present expectations as to results.

Now, I do not think this information was before the Committee on Agriculture. In fact, I do not think this information was brought to Washington, or the results of this experiment known here, until after the committee had concluded its hearings. The estimates sent in by the department are sent in, as I understand it, in September. This cotton was gathered the latter part of September, October, and the early part of November, and so the results were not and could not be known in September. But I can say from conferring with the agents of the department that they are anxious to secure a thorough test of the remedy they have been applying in the cotton district in Louisiana during the year 1916, and that they estimate that for that purpose $15,000 additional will be necessary. The Committee on Agriculture concluded its hearings before the department expected they would be concluded, and this information was not before the committee at the time this bill was made up.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUIN. Is this experiment of which you are talking something to do away with the boll weevil?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is something to control or exterminate the boll weevil. The experiments have been going on since 1904. A large amount of money has been spent in farm experimental work, but that is in order to adopt methods of farming to combat the boll weevil, but none of it has been spent, as I understand it, none can be spent, in the experiments made by these laboratories. These results are so interesting I would like to have the Clerk read a letter from the Government agent in charge of this laboratory at Tallulah, which states the results and the proposition in much better shape than I can, not being so familiar with it. I would ask the Clerk to read this letter for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY,
Washington, D. C., December 22, 1916.

DEAR MR. WILSON: Your letter of December 22 requesting information concerning the results of certain tests of the insecticide control of the boll weevil has come to hand. This investigation was opened at Tallulah in 1915. In that season every one of the nine plats treated with the poison showed a marked benefit due to the weevil control. However, these increases in production were not sufficiently large to be of great importance and it was considered possible that the dry season prevailing during 1915 was responsible for a degree of control which could not be secured under wet weather conditions. Consequently, the experiments were extended into the season of 1916 and very striking results secured. It was found that certain changes in the technique of application, such as in the time of starting and ending the application, apparently changed the results secured from a slight degree of control resulting in a comparatively unimportant increase in production to almost complete control resulting in very large increases. Considerable changes had been made in the physical and chemical properties of the insecticide utilized and also in the method of application. The field tests of the past season gave uniformly profitable results wherever the insecticide was applied in the manner which we now consider proper. For example, a series of four plats, each several acres in extent, on very rich soil gave an increased production of 425 and 426 pounds of seed cotton per acre in the poisoned plats over the check plats. Another test on poorer land treated only during the month of July gave an increased production of considerably over 100 per cent, or about 500 pounds of seed cotton per acre. An interesting feature of this last test was the fact that there were 22 days of rain during the month in which the applications were made, thus showing that the insecticide was effective regardless of the rainy weather. In still another case an abandoned field of cotton, which was so poorly drained that it had not been cultivated during June or July, was taken over on the 1st of August and one small strip (about six-tenths of an acre in extent) down the middle of this field was poisoned during August. This cotton had not been blooming since May and had set no early bolls. Shortly after the starting of the poisoning, however, the plat so treated commenced blooming and continued until the small, stunted plants had produced so much fruit that they matured and stopped all vegetative growth. This small plat stood out very prominently to the row, showing the line on each side at the termination of the poisoned area. Upon picking these plats it was found that the untreated cotton yielded from 45 to 60 pounds of seed cotton per acre, while the poisoned plat yielded about 400 pounds of seed cotton per acre in spite of the very poor stand and exceedingly stunted plant growth.

The present status of this investigation may be outlined as follows: The studies to date have indicated quite definitely that it is possible to poison the boll weevil effectively in the field under certain conditions, but that these various conditions must be thoroughly determined before it will be possible to outline any plan for the economic use of this method of control. It is apparent that quite a number of points, such as season of application, time interval between applications, amount of poison to be used per acre, period of application as regards the time of day, etc., are all of primary importance in determining the benefits secured, and all of these points must be thoroughly studied by a large series of field experiments before any definite recommendations can be made. In addition it is necessary to devise suitable and economic machinery for the application of this insecticide in the field and also to study thoroughly such questions as the possibility of substituting a cheaper chemical than the one now used, or diluting the present one in some manner. All of these investigations of course require a considerable expenditure of time and money, but in view of the present status of the investigations it seems desirable to study the question as exhaustively as possible within the next season in order to be able to release the information for the benefit of the planters at as early a date as possible if the method of control proves successful.

Very truly, yours,

B. R. COAD,
In Charge Delta Laboratory.

Hon. RILEY J. WILSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNER. I notice that the amount included in this bill this year is $10,000 larger than it was last year. Does that have anything to do with the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Well, that means there will be $10,000 more spent upon the boll weevil investigation than was spent last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I ask that my time be extended.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I would like to have five minutes in which to make a few remarks.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

Mr. MANN. You had best let it run a little bit. We may want a little time over here.

Mr. LEVER. Let us make it 25 minutes. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If that includes a sufficient time so that I may proceed for five minutes——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that there is an increase over the amount expended for last year of $10,000. That was asked for in the estimate sent in in September from the Department of Agriculture to the Committee on Agriculture, but after the results of this test and experiment had been made known to the department the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology estimated that to carry on this particular work and make an exhaustive test, and to reach a conclusion as to what benefit this might be to the cotton planter and its value as a means of boll-weevil control, in order that the Government might release the information to the farmer with instructions as to its use and application, this $15,000 additional will be necessary.

Mr. TOWNER. Is that estimate of the department subsequent to the formation of the bill?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNER. And with full knowledge of the increase which is asked for previously, and having been allowed by the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNER. Then we are certain, are we, I will ask the gentleman, that the department believes they ought to have this item increased $25,000?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Now, I would not extend that to the Secretary of Agriculture. My information is from the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology. That is the estimate he makes and the amount he desired to ask the committee for, but, of course, the Committee on Agriculture surprised even the department in the rapid manner in which it completed and closed up its business; hence there was not time for this estimate.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I will say that the bill was completed and reported to the House about 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 22d day of December, and hence the provisions of the bill were known to the Department of Agriculture, and all the appropriations as fixed by the bill they were familiar with at the time the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] received his letter.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to ask the gentleman just one further question. There was some discussion before the committee, I think, regarding a new form of the boll weevil that originated in Arizona, or something of that sort. Was that not so, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit me in his time, there was no new form of boll weevil, but there is a new type of cotton out there which makes the condition of its control a little different.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman what I wanted to know was if really the department believed this additional expenditure was necessary? I have entire sympathy with the efforts that are being made by the department and by gentlemen who are acting in the interests of the people of the South, because certainly if anything can be done to control the boll weevil, which is one of the most serious pests this country has ever had, it should be done.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. And I thank the gentleman for his statement and for his sympathy on this question.

Mr. TOWNER. Although we have no cotton in Iowa.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I want to say to the committee that the result of these experiments show, whether the test has been made on rich land in the delta or in the poor land, or the rank or luxuriant growth or scattered growth, the result has been the same, and it has been to increase the production at the rate of 425 to 500 pounds of seed cotton to the acre.

So it holds out and develops the most hopeful situation of anything that has ever been brought to light during all these years of investigation and study, and the bureau estimates that if it can secure $15,000 additional and continue these investigations during the fiscal year 1918 it would be able to demonstrate the value of this method of control and release the results to the farmers of the country.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman says the bureau says that. The letter that the gentleman read says nothing of the kind.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will say to the gentleman that this statement was given me by the chief of the bureau, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture will state that the matter was brought to his attention, and that this was the amount asked for.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Now, this letter giving all the information that the bureau had is dated the 22d of December. The committee was in session during that time, and almost at the close of the session of the committee the officials of the bureau were present, making and explaining their estimates and giving us the information they had gained as to conditions and the manner in which they were going to use their money, and they said nothing about this new condition that had developed. It was very evident that they knew all the evidence about the conditions, and they asked for only $10,000 for the work and the committee allowed it. I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out in the statement that the committee had closed its hearings on the subject, and that no estimate has been sent in since the 10th day of December by the Department of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi and Mr. KINCHELOE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to explain very briefly this new experiment which promises so much toward the destruction of this boll weevil pest. Gov. Shallenberger said before a committee of Congress a few years ago that an expert was a man who found out something that everybody else already knew and then explained it in language that nobody else could understand. Now, this particular expert is an exception to that rule. He has discovered something that nobody else knew, and he explains it in language that everybody else can understand. The pests that have heretofore destroyed cotton have fed upon the leaves, and so it became possible to spread, by mechanical means that were economical, poison on the plant, and thereby destroy the pests. But the boll weevil operates a little differently. He has a long snout—if that is the right name for it, and, not being an expert, I will speak in language you can understand—and he takes his snout and sticks it into the squares and the little boll, into the inside, so that it is not possible to get the poison there, where he will get hold of it. Now, this gentleman in the department conceived the idea that he would poison the water that the boll weevil would drink. The question was to find some poison that was very readily soluble. He got this and applied it to the cotton, and the dews of the morning melted that, and the result was that in his experiments with an area of cotton here that was treated with his poison and an area next to it that was not treated, the difference in the yield of the two was so marked that you could observe it as soon as you got into the neighborhood.

Now, having demonstrated the fact that the boll weevil could be poisoned, he realized—and all the people in the cotton belt realized—that a long step forward had been taken. But the next thing to ascertain was whether he could get a poison that could be economically applied. They believe that that can be done, but it takes a number of experiments to ascertain that fact—how many applications should be made in the year, when is the most economical time to make the application, whether early in the season when the cotton first begins to have squares on it, whether later in the season, or both, how many times, and so on. Upon that may depend the feasibility, the practicability, the success of this experiment. If it is to be applied many times, it may not be economical to do it at all.

Now, it is very desirable that they shall have enough money to carry these experiments through the entire season, to try them under many different circumstances. Down in the deltas, for instance, what might be effective there might not be worth while out in the hills in the higher and drier regions of the country; so that this money is desired in order to enable them to make a complete demonstration of the efficacy or inefficacy of the discovery, which is really the first real substantial step that has been so far taken.

We have expended a great deal of money in fighting the boll weevil heretofore, in trying to ascertain how cotton can be raised under boll-weevil conditions, but up to date we have gotten no further than to find that cotton can be produced even with the boll weevil if you will work hard and work all the time; in other words, change the old unscientific, and in many instances slovenly, cultural methods. This is the first substantial ray of light that we have, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the committee chairman about this paragraph. I notice that this amount of $74,400 is authorized and offered here for the investigation of insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, and so forth. Now, in whose discretion does it lie to determine the amount to be appropriated for the investigation of the various products and crops here?

Mr. LEVER. In all these lump-sum appropriations the discretion rests with the chief of the bureau and the Secretary of Agriculture as to the amounts that may be used on particular projects. If the gentleman is interested in tobacco——

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is what I am interested in; yes——

Mr. LEVER. I would call his attention to the fact that during the current year $19,000 of this sum——

Mr. KINCHELOE. Of the $74,400?

Mr. LEVER. Yes—will be used for tobacco horn-worm work. That is for the present year, and we assume, of course, that about the same amount will be used out of this sum for the next fiscal year, for the general statement was made that the appropriations would be devoted to the general lines of work now in progress.

Mr. KINCHELOE. There was about $19,000?

Mr. LEVER. Yes. Now, there were other allotments for sundry lines of tobacco investigations, making a total for tobacco investigations of $27,200.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And you think that will be the policy that will be pursued for the coming year? I am not antagonizing any boll-weevil proposition. I am simply trying to secure some information as to the tobacco situation. I understand the gentleman to say that his impression is that the policy of the department for the coming year will be to expend the money in the same proportion?

Mr. LEVER. Exactly.

Mr. QUIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add my word in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON]. There could be no more important investment made by this Congress, if the evidence submitted by the officer in charge of that experiment station at Tallulah, La., can be believed, and I certainly believe it. And I submit that we ought to be prepared to believe anything that these bugologists and entomologists can get up. I do not know what the cost will be per acre. The gentleman never stated it; but under that letter an increase of about 33⅓ per cent in the production of cotton in boll-weevil territory has been demonstrated, under the new discovery of that experiment station.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman that the cost, in the experiment carried on last year, was about $3 per acre, and the increase in the amount of cotton, as it sold during that year, was $40 per acre.

Mr. QUIN. That is a very small cost, if they can get $40 for $3 additional expenditure, and I do not know how much work.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The department felt that when they could experiment with it on a larger scale the cost might be much less; but in these experiments, made in a limited way, the cost averaged about $3 per acre.

Mr. QUIN. I thank the gentleman. Now, many of you gentlemen on this floor do not know what a disastrous bug the boll weevil is. I speak from experience. I suppose the district that I have the honor to represent has suffered more from the boll weevil than any other district in the United States. That little bug came there about eight years ago and ate up whole plantations and drove the negroes out of my district into the delta, into the district of my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. The merchants refused to advance a dime to raise cotton—and I think they acted wisely—and the delta planters would buy their accounts, and nearly all of our labor left, and is now in the possession of the planters in the district of my distinguished colleague [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. Land that would produce one bale of cotton to the acre before the advent of the boll weevil had its productive capacity destroyed so that under the operation of that pestiferous bug it would take 50 acres to produce four or five bales. The result was pestilence and disaster throughout all the seventh district. It was equal to the famine described in Holy Writ, when the locusts came upon the land of Egypt. It took several years for the farmers and people generally in my country to rehabilitate and become prosperous.

Now, my friends, under the beneficent and munificent work of this Agricultural Department our farmers were enabled to engage in other lines of farming. We were taught to diversify—that is, the small farmer was. He had to make his living at home and stay at the same place. The big planter, with his houses occupied by tenants, with hundreds and even thousands of acres under cultivation, was left a landlord pauper, because his labor was gone and he was unable to get money to go into the cattle business, or stock raising, or any other line of farming, to make the land productive and profitable to him and the community.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. We are not to understand, however, that Representative HUMPHREYS personally had anything to do with kidnaping these colored persons and taking them into his district? [Laughter.]

Mr. QUIN. Oh, no; it was the boll weevil that did it. It was the good fortune of the delta planters that the boll weevil drove our negroes out into Mr. HUMPHREYS's district. The boll weevil had not been in other portions of Mississippi until this year. He has gone into that portion of the State now represented by my friend STEPHENS, and my friend SISSON, and my friend HARRISON, and all over east and north Mississippi. He has gone over across into Alabama, and he is soon going to be in Georgia.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. He is there already.

Mr. QUIN. And wherever he goes his march is more devastating than that of Gen. Sherman through Georgia to the sea, and there is nothing left except the land and empty tenant houses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. I should like five minutes more.

Mr. LEVER. How much time remains, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I wish to be recognized to close the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I am endeavoring to impress upon these gentlemen the necessity of doing something that will exterminate the boll weevil. If the experiment station in Louisiana has discovered what is claimed, this little additional $15,000 for experimental work by the department is a mere bagatelle, and I believe there is something in it.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague will yield, he spoke a moment ago about the boll weevil extending up into the northern part of Mississippi. As the gentleman well knows, I represent the extreme northern district of the State of Mississippi. I have here a succinct statement which shows the result of the ravages of this terrible pest. In 1915 Alcorn County raised 9,666 bales of cotton, and in 1916 it raised 8,635. Itawamba County raised 8,866 bales in 1915, and in 1916 only 1,759 bales. Lee County raised 20,185 bales in 1915 and 6,016 bales in 1916. Lowndes County raised 8,519 bales in 1915 and 2,273 bales in 1916. Monroe County raised 14,840 bales in 1915 and 4,264 bales in 1916. Noxubee County raised 8,319 bales in 1915 and 5,137 bales in 1916. Prentiss County raised 12,822 bales in 1915 and 8,224 bales in 1916. Tishomingo County raised 6,963 bales in 1915 and 4,824 bales in 1916.

The same thing is going on all over the State.

Mr. QUIN. Why, yes; in Pike County, in which I have the honor to live, 30,000 to 35,000 bales of cotton used to be produced, and now 4,000 to 4,500 bales constitute a big crop. Adams County, which formerly raised 35,000 to 40,000 bales, has been cut down to 700 bales in one year. Those are some of the results of the ravages of the boll weevil in Mississippi. If this little additional appropriation will develop this remedy, to exterminate the boll weevil, or if it will give us an increase of 33⅓ per cent in the production of cotton on the same acreage, why not invest this additional $15,000 and let the department proceed to ascertain if they can not do even more than that. The farmers are entitled to this and should have it right now. In my judgment no better expenditure of money could be made. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think anyone is more disturbed about the boll-weevil situation than I am. Probably during this year that destructive insect will reach my own State, and probably my own district. I realize fully, through my experience on this committee, what the outbreak of the boll weevil in any cotton section means to the producers, to the bankers, to the merchants, to the business men, to all lines of industry. It creates panic; it brings about confusion. It is, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] has said, worse than the raid of Sherman's Army through our southern country. But I wish the members of the committee to understand that the Committee on Agriculture are thoroughly alive to this situation and have met it, as we think. The department is expending this current year $20,000 in experimentations on the boll weevil, experimentations that have for their purpose the development of some method of eradication of the boll weevil.

It was brought to the attention of the committee in its hearings by Dr. Howard that the young expert to whom my friend the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] has referred had made a discovery that gave encouragement for the future. The remedy, it seems, has grown out of the fact that the experts in studying the life history of the boll weevil have found that he is a very thirsty individual and must have his water early in the morning. One of the difficulties in poisoning the boll weevil heretofore has been that the arsenate of lead or any poison put on the leaf did not affect the boll weevil at all because he does not begin to eat until he has punctured the squares beyond the reach of the poison. Now, in this case they have found that by putting the arsenate of lead upon the square or stalk when it is wet with dew early in the morning the boll weevil in coming out to get his morning drink takes the poison. The result thus far has been rather promising but not entirely conclusive.

Mr. JACOWAY. Experiments thus far affecting the boll weevil have not had the results that were expected?

Mr. LEVER. The investigations by this bureau of the department of the boll weevil up to this time have been negative. They have by actual tests discarded a lot of theories because they did not prove to be practical and have rendered a good service in this respect. This is the first affirmative step that they have found that is encouraging at all. But that is not the point. We are now spending $20,000 through the Bureau of Entomology in this investigational work on the boll weevil. We are spending a much larger sum in the States Relations Service along a different line. The Department of Agriculture estimated an increase of $10,000 to continue and broaden the investigation now being carried on in Louisiana. The committee very willingly gave it, and the amendment here is to increase that $15,000 without an estimate by the department. I trust that the amendment will be voted down, because I can not see how it is possible to use it advantageously.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address the House for five minutes on this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that I will not consent to any extension of time hereafter when the committee has agreed to close the debate, I will consent in this one instance, because the gentleman from Mississippi has been very active in this proposition, and he lives in the midst of the boll-weevil section.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from South Carolina for not making an objection to an extension of time and thus giving me an opportunity to make some remarks on this subject. I do feel a great interest in this matter, and I regret exceedingly that the chairman of the committee having charge of this bill sees proper to oppose this amendment. I do not think the gentleman realizes the ruin, wreck, and devastation that comes as a result of the boll weevil. He has never had any experience with it in his section. He may have read a good deal about the matter, he may have seen newspaper stories with regard to conditions in these sections, but these things will not come to him in the way that they would if he were where they really existed.

The boll weevil has been in my State for several years. I had read about it. I was told about the great injury that was being done in other sections of my State by the boll weevil, but I had nothing like an adequate conception of the injury that was to come as a result of the work of this insect, because it had not struck my particular section of the State, just as the gentleman said it had not come into his own State.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Mississippi will realize that the chairman of the committee has grown up with the boll weevil through all of its history and knows pretty well the situation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. The gentleman has grown up with the boll weevil by way of hearsay and by way of reading, just as I had been told prior to 1916 when it came into my own particular community. Historically he may know of the boll weevil, but actually and practically he has no knowledge of the ravages of this destructive pest. I can testify to this, that in northern Mississippi last fall there were hundreds and thousands of acres in many counties that had heretofore produced many thousand bales of cotton, many an acre of which had produced more than a bale of cotton, and this year it did not produce a single lock of cotton. There were hundreds of thousands of acres where the pickers never went on the land because there was nothing to harvest.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Let me suggest to the gentleman that as a result the laborers in Mississippi sought places where the boll weevil had not entered.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. That is true; hundreds and thousands of people in that section of the country left it. I have seen trainloads of people leaving the country and seeking other fields, because their entire year's work had been lost owing to the work of this little insect.

It is really pitiful to witness in many sections the conditions that have come upon hundreds and thousands of people from the destruction of their crops. If the chairman of this committee and other Members here could only be brought to a realization of those conditions, there would be no opposition to this amendment that provides an appropriation to be used in an effort to rid the cotton-raising section of the country of the most destructive enemy that has ever invaded its confines. If time permitted, I could cite many instances of a distressing character, showing the want, poverty, and suffering resulting from the weevil. As I have stated, many thousands of acres of good land produced absolutely nothing. Many acres were not entered for the purpose of picking, because there was no cotton to pick. I have referred largely to conditions in my own section of Mississippi, but this is not simply an appeal for aid to that section, but it is made in the interest of the entire cotton belt, every portion of which is threatened.

Mr. Chairman, I go further and say that this is not simply a matter that affects the South, but that every section of our Nation where garments made of cotton are worn is interested in this matter and will be directly affected by our action in granting or refusing this appropriation.

In another way the other sections of the country will be affected. The man who can no longer grow cotton will be forced to raise other agricultural products, and these products will be thrown upon the market in competition with the sections of country that produce grain, cattle, hogs, mules, and so forth, and, therefore, depress prices in those products to the detriment of the western farmers. I suggest to the gentlemen from the West that in helping the farmers of my section you are really helping the farmers of your own sections.

It is quite probable that the diversification of crops that will come in the South as a result of the weevil may prove a blessing in many ways; but it is true that, owing to climatic conditions, character of soil, and circumstances surrounding many of the people, cotton will continue to be raised in the South.

I earnestly request and urge, gentlemen of the committee, that you vote this money out of the Public Treasury in an effort to relieve distressing conditions among the cotton farmers and also to protect and help the people of the entire country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired; all time has expired; and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEVER) there were 28 yeas and 23 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Preventing spread of moths, Bureau of Entomology: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continued spread of the gypsy and brown-tail moths by conducting such experiments as may be necessary to determine the best methods of controlling these insects; by introducing and establishing the parasites and natural enemies of these insects and colonizing them within the infested territory; by establishing and maintaining a quarantine against further spread in such manner as he shall deem best, in cooperation with the authorities of the different States concerned and with the several State experiment stations, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and for medical supplies and services and other assistance necessary for the immediate relief of foremen, scouts, and laborers, and other employees injured while engaged in hazardous work under this item of appropriation, and all other necessary expenses, $305,050.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language in the paragraph, line 2, page 55, as follows:

by establishing and maintaining a quarantine against further spread in such manner as he shall deem best, in cooperation with the authorities of the different States concerned and with the several State experiment stations.

That is subject to a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will reserve a point of order to the entire paragraph.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have no objection and the nurserymen, as far as I am advised, have no objection to the authorities quarantining against the gypsy and brown-tail moth, provided it will not be promulgated except as provided by the Federal nursery-stock law of August 12, 1912, which provides that before the Secretary of Agriculture shall promulgate such quarantine he shall, after due notice, give public hearings, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, at which hearings any interested party may appear and be heard, either by himself or attorney. I have no desire to press the point of order if the chairman will accept an amendment to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw the point of order?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] will yield a moment to permit me to make a brief statement, I desire to say that for some reason or other which I do not know about there has gotten abroad in the country an impression that there is being carried in this appropriation bill or that there is pending before the Agricultural Committee a proposition to seriously modify the nursery-stock law. There is no such proposition in this bill; there is no such proposition pending before the Agricultural Committee. There is no suggestion of such a proposition being brought before the committee that I know of. Certainly if the suggestion has been made it has not made enough impression upon my mind to make me recall it. There is not a line in the bill which affects the nursery-stock law. There is not a line in the item which we are now considering which has been modified or changed. That item has been in the bill for 10 years or more, and under it we conduct the work of the Department of Agriculture in an effort to control the spread of the gypsy and brown-tail moths in the New England States. Not a word in it is changed, and gentlemen have been unduly excited through letters and telegrams received from their nurserymen constituents, which telegrams and letters have been based on an erroneous statement, emanating from some source of which I have no knowledge. I have probably been approached by 50 Members of Congress with telegrams and I have received myself probably 50 telegrams, all couched in exactly the same language, so it appears that the information has sprung from the same source. I concede that probably this paragraph is subject to a point of order. I would think that a man who would make it, however, would be playing with fire very carelessly, because if the gypsy and brown-tail moths ever escape from the quarantine which we have thrown around them, and kept around them for 10 years, they will practically destroy certain classes of forests in this country. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] has been kind enough to show me an amendment which he desires to propose to this paragraph, which he thinks will relieve the fears of his constituents and the nurserymen throughout the country. That amendment provides:

Provided, That before the Secretary of Agriculture shall promulgate such quarantine he shall, after due notice to interested parties, give a public hearing under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, at which hearing any interested party may appear and be heard, either in person or by attorney.

That is provided for in the nursery-stock law of 1912, which was known as the Simmons bill, and which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture. I took it upon myself this morning, when I heard about these proposed amendments, to get in touch with Dr. Howard, of the Bureau of Entomology, and ascertain from him if, in fact, in the enforcement of this provision in the bill he did give due notice of quarantine and permitted hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. He informs me that he does so. So that what is sought to be accomplished by the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is already the practice of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This provision in the bill only makes an appropriation. Is not that subject to the nursery-stock law?

Mr. LEVER. I think not. I have read the nursery-stock law, and the language of the nursery-stock law is:

That it shall be unlawful to move or allow to be moved any class of nursery stock or any other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products specified in the notice of quarantine hereinbefore provided.

Mr. MANN. That covers the earth. I helped prepare that bill.

Mr. LEVER. I was not sure that it covered stock for forest products.

Mr. MANN. In the first place, that is nursery stock.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And, in the next place, it is "other plants."

Mr. LEVER. That is true. And this amendment probably is not subject to the point of order. Personally I have no objection to this, and it may relieve the fears of the nurserymen.

Mr. MANN. This provision having been carried for years, these regulations having been in force for years, under this provision they would have to make new regulations.

Mr. LEVER. That may be, but as I said a moment ago the chief of the bureau informs me that they have been operating under a provision similar to this.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but the regulations have been in force. They are in force now, and if that provision comes in then after the 1st of July they could not enforce a quarantine until they had made new regulations and given notice, and that would delay the matter several months, during which time the gypsy moth might be spread all over the country.

Mr. LEVER. Frankly, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I can see absolutely no reason for this provision, and upon a vote I shall vote against it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that, since he states that this amendment is in line with the practice of the department, it can do no harm, and I would like to ask the chairman to offer the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I am not willing to offer the amendment. As I said a moment ago, I shall vote against the amendment. I do not see that it helps the situation a particle. On the contrary, it may bring about the result suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and it may open up a situation that would expose this country to the danger of a spread of the gypsy moth. And nothing could be more fatal to the forests of this country than even a momentary let-up of the quarantine against the gypsy and brown-tail moths. Looking at this act more closely I would contest the proposition of the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] and I ask him to press his point so that we can decide that proposition.

Mr. DOWELL. Just a further question with reference to the amendment suggested. It is conceded, as I understand, by the committee that this amendment in no wise affects the ruling of the department and their action?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know just what the regulations of the department are in reference to the giving of notice as to a hearing except that I was informed by the chief of the bureau that notice always was given before quarantine was imposed, but there may be something in the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that by this language we may slightly change the situation and therefore expose the country to an outbreak of the gypsy moth.

Mr. DOWELL. But the gentleman concedes that notice should be given?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly a notice should always be given.

Mr. DOWELL. It does not go into effect, as I understand it, until July 1.

Mr. LEVER. Notice is now being given.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand, this appropriation takes effect on July 1?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any reason in the world why the department should not prepare any notice that may be necessary by the time this law goes into effect if we make the amendment which it occurs to me should be made to this bill?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman had as full appreciation of a delicate situation with respect to the danger of an outbreak in this country of the gypsy moth and brown-tail moth as the membership of the Committee on Agriculture has, I am sure he would not be willing to legislate upon that kind of situation unless the matter had been most thoroughly considered by a committee, and that committee had had the opportunity to examine very carefully into the situation and to consult those who have charge of the enforcement of the law, and for that reason alone I would vote against the proposition.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out——

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order now pending.

Mr. DOWELL. It is a question of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order on my part.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. As long as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] reserves a point of order on certain language of the paragraph, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] has a point of order.

Mr. ALMON. Of course the fact will not be denied that this appropriation has been carried for probably 10 years in the Agricultural appropriation bill in this way, but that does not keep it from being subject to a point of order at this time. The only question involved on the question of the point of order is as to whether the Federal nursery-stock law of 1912 authorizes this appropriation. That seems to be in doubt in the mind of the chairman this morning. In fact, he did not think it applied. If not, it will be subject to a point of order. He now seems to be of the opinion that it is applicable and that this is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNER. It occurs to me that the question regarding a point of order is rather a serious one. I think the gentleman would hardly desire that the point of order should be sustained against it. Would it not be safer if the gentleman withdrew his point of order, and, if possible, secure the withdrawal of other points of order that have been made, and save his amendment?

Mr. ALMON. I stated plainly and emphatically that I would not insist upon the point of order, even against that part providing for the quarantine. I have no objection to a quarantine being promulgated against the gypsy moth and brown-tail moth, provided it is done in the way and manner provided in the Federal nursery-stock law of August 20, 1912.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. How would it do to put in the bill "by establishing and maintaining a quarantine against such further spread in such manner" where it now reads "as deems best"—"in such manner as provided by the nursery-stock law"?

Mr. ALMON. I will state that is a fair amendment, and I am willing to accept in lieu of the one that has been presented one which will read:

Provided, That no such quarantine shall be promulgated except in the manner provided by the provisions of this act of August 20, 1912, entitled "An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plant products."

That would remedy it.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me possibly the trouble with that will be it will leave open some period of time when there is no quarantine at all.

Mr. ALMON. It will mean, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, that no additional quarantine shall be promulgated. It would not interfere with any already in force and operation and which have heretofore been promulgated, and it would require this notice to be given and an opportunity to be heard before any additional quarantine is promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. But that is positive legislation. This item goes into effect on the 1st of July. Now, a quarantine regulation would have to be issued in accordance with that. The old quarantine regulations would have no money with which to enforce them.

Mr. ALMON. Why not say "Provided no such quarantine shall be promulgated after a certain date"?

Mr. MANN. If you say "quarantine in the manner provided in this act" the existing regulations, being in accordance with the act, would continue with no period of time and would do exactly what you want to do. Strike out the language "as he shall deem best."

Mr. ALMON. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois what objection he would have to the amendment which has been read by the gentleman from South Carolina and myself, which is in accordance with the general nursery-stock law, providing for notice and hearings to be given?

Mr. MANN. The objection I have—and I do not say it is a valid one, but it seems to me it is—is that this is an appropriation in the bill to carry out certain purposes, including the nursery-stock law. The old appropriation ends on the 30th of June. The new appropriation becomes available on the 1st of July, but the old quarantine regulations will not have any money with which to enforce them after the 30th day of June, because you require new notice to be given, and, under the regulations to be made and under the nursery-stock law, that takes time. And for aught that I can see there would be a lapse of a period of time there where there would be no regulation which could be enforced, and the gypsy moth——

Mr. BUTLER. Flies very fast.

Mr. MANN. The trouble with the female gypsy moth is that it can not fly at all, and the only way it can be spread is through nursery stock, and once it gets into a locality you can not get it out.

Mr. LEVER. Let us see if we get clearly what the gentleman from Illinois has in mind. The 1st of July comes; this provision is in the bill; there is no money at that moment to enforce the regulations that were enforced two hours before. Now, then, they have got to issue their regulations; they have got to give notice of a hearing. That might take 30 days, and there is a lapse of 30 days in which you have absolutely no control of the gypsy moth. Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. MANN. Yes. This being at end, it would require new regulations after notice, and without regulations it could not be enforced.

Mr. LEVER. It is a very difficult situation.

Mr. MANN. But it is easy to accomplish what the gentleman wants to accomplish.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman repeat that verbiage again?

Mr. MANN. Strike out where it says "in such manner as he shall deem best"; strike out "as he shall deem best" and insert "in such manner as is provided by the nursery-stock law," giving the title to it.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will read.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I suggest that he withdraw the point of order and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will withdraw his, so that the field will be clear for amendment.

Mr. ALMON. Yes. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. MANN. And I withdraw mine.

Mr. ALMON. I offer an amendment to read:

Amend, page 55, line 6, by striking out "as he shall deem best" and inserting "as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, dated August 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plant products.'"

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the gentleman to say line 6. Is it not line 3?

Mr. ALMON. Yes; lines 3 and 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALMON: Page 55, lines 3 and 4, after the word "manner," in line 3, strike out "as he shall deem best" and insert "as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, dated August 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plant products,'" so that the paragraph as amended will read: "By establishing and maintaining a quarantine against further spread in such manner as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, dated August 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plant products.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, would the Clerk report that amendment again? I did not catch one certain word of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I suggest that you insert right there "in lieu thereof."

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 55, lines 3 and 4, after the word "manner," strike out "as he shall deem best" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, dated August 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to regulate the importation of nursery-stock and other plant products.'"

Mr. LEVER. It ought to be "other plants and plant products." I am giving the exact title of the act.

Mr. STAFFORD. If you are going to quote the title, you had better quote it entirely. You are only quoting it partially.

Mr. ALMON. I agree with the gentleman, and I will get it from the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire if it would not be better to strike out——

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by describing the title of the act of 1912 in full.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so modified.

Mr. ALMON. I ask the Clerk to report the amendment as modified.

Mr. DOWELL. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. May I inquire if it would not be better to strike out also the words "in such manner"?

Mr. ALMON. We have done that.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague will permit, I think it will spoil the force of the amendment as intended by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us take it as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: Page 55, line 3, after the word "manner," strike out the words "as he shall deem best" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, dated August 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests; to promote and regulate the movement of fruit, and also fungicides, and for regulating traffic therein.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Chairman, again the gentleman has not gotten the title right. I suggest that instead of using a copy of some bill he take the phraseology from the act itself.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may pass this item over temporarily while the gentleman from Alabama perfects his amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Is it agreeable to the gentleman from South Carolina to rise at this time?

Mr. LEVER. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARAWAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INCREASE OF SALARIES, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I present a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House report No. 1254.

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration H. Res. 432, respectfully reports the same to the House with the recommendation that it be agreed to.

"Resolved, That it shall be in order to consider an amendment to a bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, as follows, notwithstanding the general rules of the House:

"'That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for all persons employed under the Department of Agriculture, including on the lump-sum rolls only those persons who are carried thereon at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate per annum less than $1,200, and increased compensation at a rate of 5 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate of not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, so much as may be necessary is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation provided by this section shall not apply to persons whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, or whose services are needed for brief periods at intervals, or to any persons who receive a part of their salaries or wages from any outside sources under cooperative arrangements with the Department of Agriculture: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein'; and be it further

"Resolved, That no amendment shall be in order in the consideration of the foregoing amendment changing existing law beyond the fiscal year 1918, nor shall any amendment be in order relating to the compensation of employees not appropriated for in H. R. 19359."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in so far as the language of the rule is concerned, it is precisely the same as that which was used in connection with the amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The language that is proposed in the act itself is somewhat different from that which is proposed in the legislative bill, and the change is made necessary by the different conditions with which the Agricultural Committee has to deal. Does any gentleman desire any time?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire if this rule does not relate also to the time between the enactment of this law and the 1st of July, 1917, and does it not in that respect differ from the other rule?

Mr. GARRETT. Is the gentleman speaking of the rule now, or the law?

Mr. DOWELL. I mean the rule. As I understand it, the rule limits it to this enactment.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the other rule, as I understand, it is merely limited to the expiration of the time of this appropriation.

Mr. GARRETT. It is exactly the same language that was in the other rule, and there were rulings by the chairman on that, which, of course, will be precedents in ruling on this.

Mr. DOWELL. I understood there was a difference.

Mr. GARRETT. No; there is no difference at all in the language.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, with Mr. CARAWAY in the chair.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered, for the purpose of offering the following amendment, which correctly sets out the title of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn, and the gentleman from Alabama offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALMON: Page 55, line 3, after the word "manner," strike out the words "as he shall deem best," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, dated August 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests, to promote and regulate the movement of plants and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he change the word "dated" to the word "approved."

Mr. ALMON. I accept that suggestion and ask unanimous consent that the Clerk make that correction.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so modified. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported as finally modified?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALMON: Page 55, line 3, after the word "manner," strike out the words "as he shall deem best," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, approved August 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests, to promote and regulate the movement of plants and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. HOWARD. I was not on the floor when this discussion began. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what is the object of this amendment?

Mr. ALMON. I first raised a point of order against the paragraph, on the idea that the appropriation was not justified by the general nursery-stock law of 1912, but the chairman ruled that it was. The general nursery-stock law requires that before a quarantine shall be promulgated, notice shall be given to interested parties, and that they be given an opportunity to be heard before it is promulgated. In order to keep down the fears of the nurserymen of the country, some of whom are in my district, and whose fears seem to have been aroused, we have put in this proviso so that the quarantine against the gypsy and brown-tail moths shall not be promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture except after notice to interested parties and an opportunity is given to be heard in the manner provided by the general nursery-stock law.

Mr. SLOAN. Can the gentleman state whether or not there is any extension of the power of the Secretary of Agriculture in the making or promulgating of rules for quarantine in this amendment, or in the new legislation on page 55 of the bill?

Mr. ALMON. Not that I know of.

Mr. LEVER. There is absolutely none, I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska. In the first place, the language of the bill, on page 55, is not new language. It has been carried in the bill now in that identical language for 10 years, and this amendment which is proposed neither increases nor diminishes the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SLOAN. And the purpose of the amendment is to make it clear that the Secretary has not the new powers which it was thought were about to be granted to him in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; the amendment is to satisfy the fears of nurserymen.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Have these State entomologists and these Federal entomologists the power arbitrarily to say that the nursery stock from the Stark Nursery, for instance, in my county, shall not be shipped into Illinois, or Iowa, or South Carolina, or any other State?

Mr. LEVER. They have, after notice, under the act of 1912.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose they make an erroneous ruling about it, how do you get at it? Is there any appeal from the decision of one of these bugologists?

Mr. LEVER. I have not refreshed my memory, but I do not think there is any appeal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One of them could bankrupt the biggest nursery in the world.

Mr. ALMON. That shows the importance of notice.

Mr. MANN. Those things are all pretty well provided for in the nursery-stock law. Tests may be made, and everything else done under inspection, so that practically there can be no question in reference to whether the quarantine regulations are correctly applied, because authority is given to make actual tests under inspection.

Mr. TOWNER. The provision of the law is that it can not be done without a hearing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but suppose one of these learned scientists makes an erroneous ruling about the nursery stock of any nursery whatsoever. Is there any way of appealing from his decision?

Mr. TOWNER. There is the right of appeal to the Secretary of Agriculture. As to whether or not they may go any further, that would be a question I would not like to answer.

Mr. LEVER. If so, I do not recall it.

Mr. TOWNER. There is no particular provision, but if there is no provision against it, certainly an appeal would lie.

Mr. LEVER. To whom?

Mr. TOWNER. To the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, I thought the gentleman meant an appeal beyond the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no; I do not say that there would be any appeal that might lie beyond that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My recollection is, although it may be entirely erroneous, that either the brown-tail moth or the gypsy moth was brought into the country shortly after the Civil War. The other was brought in about 1890. They have proved a very great pest in New England. Up to date they have not been very successful, as far as I can ascertain, in finding a parasite which will destroy them. The female of the gypsy moth can not fly, and the only way it can spread at any distance is through nursery stock—by the shipment of plants which have the eggs of the moth upon them. I think the eggs are laid in August and hatched in the following spring.

My recollection is that there are two broods of the brown-tail moth, and the female of the brown-tail moth is an active flier. The brown-tail moth is not only destructive to trees but the caterpillars themselves have hairs upon them, and when they molt and get in the air, wherever they strike the flesh of a person it inflicts a wound. They are poisonous and exceedingly disagreeable to people who happen to live where they have this pest. The pest in both cases is very apt to be on street trees in cities, and so we do not want them out in our country.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance of the Montana National Bison Range and other reservations and for the maintenance of game introduced into suitable localities on public lands, under supervision of the Biological Survey, including construction of fencing, wardens' quarters, shelters for animals, landings, roads, trails, bridges, ditches, telephone lines, rockwork, bulkheads, and other improvements necessary for the economical administration and protection of the reservations, and for the enforcement of section 84 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," $30,000, of which sum $2,500 may be used for the purchase, capture, and transportation of game for national reservations.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 57, line 4, after the word "States," strike out the figures "30,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "35,000."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because this includes the care of 5 big game reservations and about 70 bird reservations. Thirty thousand dollars is a remarkably small sum of money for the work, so small that you wonder how the Biological Survey does anything substantial with it. If you take the 70 bird reservations and the big-game reservations and add them together you find that the $30,000 gives only $400 apiece. Now, it requires considerably more than $400 to take care of each of the great elk and bison reservations, and consequently a good many of the bird reservations have no care whatever.

In the hearings Dr. Palmer, of the Biological Survey, said that some 15 or 16 bird reservations have no wardens. While it is admitted that a few are small and do not need wardens, there are some very large ones, like the Laysan Islands Reservation, in the Hawaiian Islands, and the Aleutian Islands Reservation, off the coast of Alaska, where we have no wardens and no way of knowing whether there is poaching on these great reservations or not except as we hear it reported by travelers or by some ship that has happened there long after it has occurred.

It is also brought out in the hearings that the work now being done in the care of the bird reservations is possible only through the cooperation and money raised by the National Association of Audubon Societies. They collect money and that money is used for the purpose of doing work that ought to be done by the United States Government.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. ELSTON. I asked the gentleman a question when this matter was up before about the Laysan Islands in Hawaii. What is being done, and whether or not we have any patrol of those islands?

Mr. PLATT. According to the statement of Dr. Nelson, Chief of the Biological Survey, nothing is being done whatever. Those islands extend over several degrees of longitude. It is a large aggregate of little islands. We have no warden there, and we can only afford to send a steamer there once a year or so to see whether any harm has been done. Hundreds and thousands of birds have been killed there in the past by poachers for their breasts and plumage, and we have not known anything about it for months afterwards.

Mr. ELSTON. I understood that there was a warden appointed for service on those particular islands.

Mr. PLATT. Not according to the statement of the chief of the bureau of the Biological Survey. The appropriation for wardens was increased somewhat in the last bill, but not enough, in the judgment of the survey, to provide for this large group of islands.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman state whether it is an important bird reservation by reason of its location, and so forth?

Mr. PLATT. It is very important, affording a nesting place for many thousands of sea birds like the albatross.

Mr. ELSTON. How important in comparison with other bird reservations?

Mr. PLATT. I should say that the bird reservations in the United States which care for game birds in their winter homes are more important. Some of these have very little care, and what care they have is largely through private subscriptions of the Audubon Society. A good many reservations are along the coasts, some on the Atlantic and some on the Pacific and some on the Gulf; one is on an island in Lake Michigan. They are scattered all over the country. One of the most important is off the coast of Louisiana.

Mr. ELSTON. The reason I asked the question is on account of a constituent of mine, Walter Hubbard, who is very much interested in this particular subject. He has written me many times, and he has been much interested in the statements of the gentleman from New York along these lines. He believes that there should be something done in the way of protection in the Laysan Islands, and he says that rabbits and rodents are very destructive to bird life there.

Mr. PLATT. There is a very interesting bulletin issued by the Biological Survey which tells about the islands of Laysan Reservation, upon one or two of which rabbits have been destructive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

[By unanimous consent Mr. PLATT's time was extended two minutes.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is all of this money appropriated to be used on national reservations?

Mr. PLATT. This is what the increase over the last appropriation was requested for.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A good many States have game-preserve laws, and I was wondering whether any of it was used in connection with the game laws of different States.

Mr. PLATT. This money is used to care for reservations belonging to the United States Government, and which are now imperfectly cared for and some not at all.

Dr. Nelson asked for an increase of $15,000. The committee has given him an increase of $5,000. He says that $4,000 or $5,000 are needed for fencing and improvements, almost necessary in the big game reservations. For instance, one Government game reservation—the Wind Cave Park—in South Dakota has a fence only on one side. It is not fenced on the other, and he says that a thousand dollars is needed there. It would seem axiomatic that if it is fenced on one side, it ought to be fenced on the other. Dr. Nelson tells of one of the other reservations—the Niobrara Reservation, in Nebraska—where if they could fence in a little more ground they would not have to feed the game in the wintertime. There is plenty of grazing outside, but they can not allow the herd to forage outside at will. They have to cut the forage and bring it in. It would seem to me that it would be good economy for the Government to increase this appropriation a little. The men of the Biological Survey have done wonders with the small amount of money at their command, but they have done it largely through the cooperation of the Audubon Societies and other help.

Mr. FESS. Have these reservations a utilitarian value?

Mr. PLATT. Unquestionably. If the gentleman will read the hearings of the Department of Agriculture upon the biological section he will find that since the passage of the bird migration law and the establishment of these refuges the number of wild fowl has greatly increased in certain portions of the country.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the estimates call for an increase in this item of $15,000. The committee allowed $5,000, feeling that that was sufficient in the present exigency for this purpose. I trust the amendment may be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The precise subject which I desire to discuss for a moment is not directly connected with the game mentioned in this paragraph, but it may be well described as a game, a kind of political game. We have had a number of debates in this House, and the country has speculated widely as to just what were the reasons which caused the result in the last election. I myself have been much puzzled about it. I have been particularly puzzled as to the results in California and in New Hampshire, but this morning for the first time I was enlightened by reading a paragraph which appeared in the Washington Post, giving the reasons for the results in California and in New Hampshire, in the form of an interview with a prominent Democrat of San Francisco. The title given to the interview is "Election credit to Daniels." Observe the word "credit" as used in this connection:

ELECTION CREDIT TO DANIELS.

"If any member of the President's administration is deserving of credit for winning the recent election, it is Secretary of the Navy Daniels," observed H. A. Brown, of San Francisco, at the Willard.

I am informed, Mr. Chairman, by a member of the California delegation that Mr. Brown is a well-known Democrat in California. He then proceeds:

"It is my belief that Secretary Daniels is responsible for the carrying of California and New Hampshire. In both States there are navy yards, and the Secretary of Navy piled work up in both. Thousands of men were given employment at Kittery, near Portsmouth, and for the first time since 1856 the city of Portsmouth went Democratic and the State of New Hampshire was carried by the Democrats by a plurality of less than 100. It was all because of the great number of Democrats that had gone into the navy yard there."

[Laughter.]

"So in California, the city of Vallejo, which has always been a Republican city, was carried by the Democrats because of the presence in the navy yard at Mare Island of thousands of men who were engaged in work that the Secretary of Navy had provided. California, we know, was carried by Wilson by a plurality of less than 4,000. Vallejo gave a Democratic plurality of something like 5,000. Had it been turned the other way the Republicans would have won in the State and Hughes would have been elected.

He closes the interview as follows:

"The Secretary of the Navy is some politician, in my opinion."

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not advised as to the truth or falsity of this accusation—I ought not to say accusation, but of this commendation, this eulogium upon the political ability of the Secretary of the Navy. If it is true, however, I say then that all honor and credit—of a sort—should be given to that statesman who makes use of his authority over the Navy to get votes for his Chief—his party.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there a navy yard in Ohio? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is not, and, therefore, the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, was not able to use his distinguished services in helping to carry that State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Notwithstanding the absence of a navy yard, we carried it by a large majority.

Mr. BENNET. Is it not true that Secretary Daniels assisted in carrying Ohio by refraining from making any speeches there? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. That I understand to be the real reason.

Mr. SLOAN. Will this statement come under the head of political "leaks"?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] seems anxious to know why the Democrats carried the country in the last election. The success of the Democratic Party was the triumph of mind over matter. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman objects to Secretary Daniels taking men and giving them employment in the navy yard. The Republican Party took negroes out of the South last fall and put them in West Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana to carry those States for the Republican ticket. [Applause.] Daniels with his men was engaged in a good cause, while the Republican Party with illegal negro votes was trying to defeat the will of qualified white voters in Northern States. This man Brown is a very intelligent man. Mr. Brown has been keeping up with the great work of Secretary Daniels. Admiral Dewey, who is the best authority on matters that pertain to the Navy, has praised the record of Josephus Daniels and practically said that he was the best Secretary that the Navy had had in many years. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Where did he say that?

Mr. HEFLIN. He said that before the election. I heartily indorse the statement. Secretary Daniels has cut out Republican graft and instituted more beneficial reforms than all the Republican Secretaries before him. Interests that sought to control him and failed have tried to belittle and destroy him. They used subsidized newspapers for that purpose, but they failed utterly. Wherever Josephus Daniels went in the recent campaign he helped the Democratic cause and enlightened even members of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While you nominated your strongest man for President, he was an animated icicle with frost on his whiskers. [Laughter.] Ex-Congressman Fred Landis, of Indiana, has told, perhaps better than anybody else, just why the two strongest Republicans that could be found—your candidates for President and Vice President—were defeated. He said that in the opinion of the rank and file the country over neither Hughes nor Fairbanks belong to the human family. [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats. L., pp. 847, 848), relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, and for cooperation with local authorities in the protection of migratory birds, and for necessary investigations connected therewith, $50,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOOLITTLE: Page 58, line 18, strike out semicolon and insert a colon and the following language:

"Provided, That no part of said sum shall be spent in the prosecution of any person or persons who may hunt, trap, or shoot migratory game and insectivorous birds in conformity with the laws of any State or Territory where such hunting, trapping, or shooting may take place."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is a change of existing law. It repeals the law, really.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is a limitation on the expenditure of the $50,000 carried in the bill. It reduces expenditures and is a limitation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not invoke the rule of limitation if the limitation goes to the extent of repealing the law. This limitation in effect modifies existing law, so far as migratory birds are concerned, and therefore is subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. I was about to reenforce what the gentleman from Wisconsin said, that the rule of limitation is that the limitation must apply to the appropriation and not change law or involve additional duties upon the heads of departments, and the like of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph commencing on page 58, line 11, and down to and including line 18.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds I would like to ask unanimous consent that the debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we ought to limit debate on this paragraph just yet.

Mr. LEVER. Well, I am ready to accede to the judgment of a member of the committee. I withdraw the request.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my purpose in making this motion to strike out the appropriation of $50,000 is to prevent the enforcement of the law, which is, in my opinion, and which is in the opinion, I believe, of every lawyer on the floor of this House, an unconstitutional and unfair law. It will not be denied that the title to wild game is in the States, that it is not in the Federal Government or any individual. There is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States a case appealed from the United States court in Arkansas which brings in point directly in the court of last resort the question of the constitutionality of this law. The court in Arkansas held the law to be unconstitutional. I believe the Supreme Court will also hold it to be unconstitutional, because I think, as a matter of law and as a matter of fact, it is unconstitutional. But, laying aside for the moment the question of the constitutionality of the law, it seems to me that the game laws of the different States of our country safeguard well and sufficiently the game of the country, and that those laws should be considered by Congress as sufficient protection for the wild game birds of the country. In central parts of the United States the regulations that have been laid down by the department under this Federal law have absolutely wiped out spring hunting of migratory birds, such as wild duck and geese. The game laws of all those States, so far as I know—and I know particularly of Kansas—are very strict in the protection of game and limit the hunting, shooting, and trapping of game and birds to very limited periods of time in the fall, and again in the early spring; and the season for shooting is closed before the breeding season comes on in the spring. If my amendment prevails, conditions will be improved without injury to anybody and without violence to the migratory game birds of the country, and the laws of the States will prevail.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is familiar, I am sure, with the treaty which was entered into last August, I think, between this country and the Dominion of Canada, with reference to the protection of migratory birds and migratory game?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I know there was a treaty of that kind.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think, in view of that treaty, which is the supreme law of the land as applies to this country, it is not entirely probable that Congress now has supreme authority to regulate the protection of migratory birds?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should not think so, unless the law is declared constitutional later.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has referred to State laws upon the subject. If that be a proper construction, then I take it that Congress, of course, can assume authority regardless of any law that has been passed upon the subject by any State?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know what the legal effect of that will be on the constitutionality of the law. I think if it was constitutional to begin with it would remain so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not the gentleman know that that treaty has not been ratified?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My impression is it has not been ratified.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My impression was it had been ratified. Is the gentleman sure it has not been ratified?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not sure; but I think it has not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The reason I was so confident it had been ratified was because I had seen an opinion rendered upon that treaty as to its effect on State laws with reference to migratory birds.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A copy of the treaty has been incorporated in a bulletin which has been sent out by the department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it the department would not have sent the treaty out or incorporated it in a bulletin if it was not in actual effect.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My understanding was that it was ratified last August. Of course, that is a matter of record.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LEVER. One moment. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Georgia proceeds, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks that the debate on this paragraph and amendments close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LEVER. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] to have five minutes, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] five minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] five minutes, and myself five.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I hope to get through with this bill to-day. I modify it, then, Mr. Chairman, by making it 25 minutes, with the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] included.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina modifies his request and asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it would be a most unfortunate blow to the work that is being done by this bureau if this appropriation were to be stricken out. I believe that the protection of the migratory birds of this country under the act of 1910 has been of wonderful benefit to the entire country.

Now, I love to hunt about as well as the ordinary fellow. I am very fond of hunting. But I never did believe in the slaughter of birds. I presume there are a dozen men in this House now who can remember, and I also can remember when I was a little boy, how the wild pigeons used to migrate to the South in the fall of the year by the millions, and on account of the peculiar habits of those birds, especially their roosting habits, the people would turn loose upon them and would slaughter them by the hundreds of thousands, so that to-day the whole wild pigeon family, you might say, is extinct. There is not one in the world.

Now, a few years ago I used to go out in south Georgia and northern Florida duck hunting. In 1902, 1903, and 1904 the wild ducks absolutely became so scarce in the South in the dead of winter that you could hardly go out on the lakes and bag half a dozen in a day after a strenuous day's hunting. To-day they are coming back into the South, ducks and geese, by the thousands. I may say further that I happened to be in the southern part of Georgia in November last, where we used to have millions of jacksnipes to shoot 15 or 20 years ago. It got to be a rare thing to see a jacksnipe in the South in the wintertime for the past several years. This fall they came in there again by the thousands. Woodcock also were almost extinct. That is a migratory bird. It nests in the North in the summer and comes down to the South in the winter. They are now coming down in large numbers.

Now, every State in the Union that I know of gives these sportsmen—not pothunters, like my friend from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE]—but gives true sportsmen an opportunity to get some sport, to shoot these birds in some season when the birds are in their flight south. Now he complains because the folks in Kansas can not kill them on the spring flight. He wants to kill them going up and coming down both. He is not satisfied with the modest killing of game. He wants to be allowed to kill them coming down and also going back.

Mr. DOOLITTLE Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We have laws in Kansas limiting the number you can shoot.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; you have, but not half of you obey the law. You violate the law. The law provides that only so many wild ducks may be shot to the gun. You go out and take a boy along with you, and he carries a gun, and he could not hit the side of a house, and the man along with him who can shoot kills 50. That is the way they violate the law. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was down town the other day and I met half a dozen men walking along the street, and each one of them had a couple of dozen ducks strung over his back. Do you think that that ought to be regulated?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; and this law will regulate that. That is marketing game. I understand my friend from New York [Mr. PLATT] misses more than he hits. [Laughter.] But I do not think the man who can not kill one ought to be in favor of depriving another man of the privilege of eating one. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will permit me, I never hunt with a gun. I hunt with a spyglass and I never miss. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the gentleman never kills a bird, and that is why I made the remark, and I commend his method of hunting as most economical.

Gentleman, I hope this law will not be butchered. I hope we will appropriate more money for its enforcement than is now appropriated. It is doing good. It is building up our game supply in this country. We have got more game under this law than we have ever had in recent years, and I hope the amendment will not prevail. This law is in the hands of the most conscientious and efficient administrators and they should be encouraged in their splendid efforts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] that instead of this appropriation being abolished or reduced it should be increased. I have an opinion of a man who owns a dog and a gun and spends his time going over the country shooting insectivorous birds and small animals.

We used to have plenty of quail, "Bob White," and as soon as the open season comes in very many owning a dog and gun start out and kill them. My opinion is that one "Bob White" is worth about a score of those fellows that hunt them and try to kill them. [Laughter.] I believe we should increase the appropriation rather than reduce it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman, but I am not sure that I can hear him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I want to ask the gentleman if he would call a quail a migratory bird?

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Certainly. It does not stay all the time in the same place. It may go from part of our State to another part of it, and I have no doubt it gets out into New Jersey now and then.

A MEMBER. Would the gentleman call a wild duck an insectivorous bird—would he?

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. It is a game bird. What does a man want to shoot a bird for anyway—a man that is educated, that has got a mind and a soul; a man that has got intelligence, whose father has spent thousands of dollars in educating him—what does he want to go out and kill something for? [Applause.]

A MEMBER. Roosevelt! [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. I have my opinion of a man who has a dog and spends his time in hunting. That fellow and his dog ought to be killed and the birds ought to be preserved. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss the necessity for this law. I have no objection to migratory game being protected, but I do not believe the wildest stretch of the most liberal constructionist of the Federal Constitution can find any excuse at all for this law.

On the contrary the Constitution specifically prevents the confiscation of property by the Federal Government except by due process of law.

On every occasion when the question of birds or animals, feræ naturæ, has been before the Supreme Court of the United States, that court has held that they are the property of the people of the States.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Not now. I have only five minutes, and I want to state my objection to this paragraph of the bill. The only way in which an individual ever gets title to birds or animals, feræ naturæ, is either by reducing them to captivity or by bringing them to the ground. The court having repeatedly decided that all such animals and game belong to the people of the States, the Federal Government in the act creating this law said that the title to this property should be vested in the Federal Government, thereby divesting the people who have always owned that property, and taking away from the people of the States that which they own, as has been repeatedly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore, when the Supreme Court of the United States passes upon this question, I do not believe a majority of that court will go to the extent of saying that Congress by its act can take away from the people their property and vest the title in the Government of the United States, and that is exactly what that law attempted to do when it was passed. I have never voted for this appropriation in this bill. I opposed the passage of the law when it was proposed by Mr. WEEKS, of Massachusetts, now a member of the Senate. For that reason I do not believe that this item in this appropriation bill ought to remain in the bill, but the committee ought to vote it out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I will if I have the time.

Mr. MANN. Admitting for the sake of the argument the gentleman's position, does he think that the treaty just proclaimed between the United States and Great Britain, controlling the migration of birds between this country and Canada, would be invalid?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. MANN. Under the treaty-making power?

Mr. SISSON. I do. The first time that matter was called in question was when Washington was President, and a young Representative from the State of Pennsylvania called the matter in question. The language of the Constitution, saying that a treaty shall be the supreme law of the land, has never been construed by the Supreme Court, or by any subordinate court, to mean that it can supersede the Constitution, and the treaty-making power is limited in the instrument to the specific grant of power to the Federal Government over which it has jurisdiction. Therefore the Congress of the United States has no right to enter into a treaty that the Federal Government had not the power delegated to it to control. If it could do that, and that language in the Constitution should receive any other construction, then under the treaty-making power you could literally destroy the Government through the Executive and a bare majority in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was to have five minutes, and I ask that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] be recognized in my stead. He knows more about birds than all the rest of us.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Illinois for giving me his time and for his complimentary words in regard to my knowledge of birds. It is not nearly as extensive as it might be. I want to say, though, that there is quite a good deal of confusion of mind over the migratory-bird law. It does not apply to quail, or to grouse, or to prairie chickens, or to many other birds that are not migratory. Quail, as I understand it, very rarely fly more than 10 or 12 miles from home. That is according to the testimony of those who know most about that bird. The migratory-bird law applies only to birds which nest in one part of North America and make their winter homes in another part of North America, or many of them in South America or Central America. How those birds can be considered to be the property of anybody over whose land they happen to fly, or where they happen to spend the night resting, when they go on the next day, I do not, for my part, understand. Nearly all the migratory game birds nest in Canada, and the Canadians could destroy the whole lot of them, except a very few that nest along our northern border, if they wanted to do so.

The insectivorous birds, the warblers and smaller birds, a great many of them also nest in Canada, though many, of course, nest in the United States. A considerable number of our birds spend their winters in South America, and most of the routes of migration have been mapped out. We know now almost exactly what routes many of them follow, how they get to South America, and where they winter when they get there. There are a few common birds which seem to disappear in the winter. For instance, the common chimney swift is a bird whose winter home has never been found. It goes down to the coast of the Gulf of Mexico and flies off over the Gulf, and nobody knows what becomes of it. Even our friend, Col. Theodore Roosevelt, who has explored South America, has never been able to find the winter home of the chimney swift there. It goes off in that direction somewhere and disappears as completely as if it dropped into the sea. There are several other such mysteries as that, but as to a great many birds it is known just where they go, and just when they come and when they go. There are some 300 or 400 people throughout the United States who are reporting to the Biological Survey the dates of the arrival and departure of the birds every year, so that the Biological Survey is able, through these voluntary observers, to keep track of our useful birds, and the speed they make, and some very interesting things have been worked out from these reports by the late Prof. Cooke.

As I have said, migratory game birds mostly nest in Canada, and Canada could destroy them all. They do not belong to us. They fly over the United States. Many of them winter along the Gulf, and there are some bird reservations where they get a certain almost complete protection. It is the testimony of everybody who has watched the matter that certain of these wild fowl and game birds have increased considerably since the passage of the migratory-bird law, and that is true also of a good many of the smaller birds. During last summer, for instance, in my part of the country a great many people became interested in birds, because for the first time they saw the scarlet tanager, a beautiful, bright-colored bird, which looks almost tropical in the colors of its plumage. That bird began to appear in the cities. People had never seen it before. A number of people called me up on the telephone to know what that bright-colored bird was which they saw in the streets. It is a bird that was rarely seen in the streets before, although not uncommon in the country. Its numbers have undoubtedly increased considerably during the past year. It is a bird probably that used to be shot for its plumage on account of its brilliancy of color. Unless some migratory-bird law is enforced, a great many of our birds will become extinct. While they spread over a very large territory in summer, in the winter some of them mass together so that they can be killed very easily, almost without shooting them. They are dependent upon the migratory law and upon bird sanctuaries for protection. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] indicated, a treaty has recently been negotiated with Canada, a bird-migration treaty, by which Canada agrees to protect the birds at nesting time in the north and the United States agrees to protect them as they fly over and as they may stop on our territory to winter. It seems to me common sense and good judgment that the legislation the treaty will need should be carried out, and must appeal to everybody. It is impossible, it seems to me, that the Supreme Court can find it unconstitutional.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the questions can be answered readily, it seems to me. In the first place, as to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, Series No. 628, of August 16, 1916; was ratified and advised by the Senate August 29, 1916; ratified by the President September 1, 1916; by Great Britain October 20, 1916. Ratifications exchanged at Washington December 7, 1916, and proclaimed December 8, 1916. Certain courts have held that this law is unconstitutional, others holding that it is constitutional; the case is now pending on appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States. The same fight was made a year ago when the Agricultural appropriation bill was up and was being considered on this item. It is moved now to strike out the entire item. The law is enforcible, it is being enforced, and it is the judgment and wisdom of Congress that it should be enforced, and it seems to me that no Member of the House or of the committee should attempt to break down this proper and beneficial legislation or attempt to defeat its operation. The only way to enforce it is by making the proper appropriations so that the Agricultural Department can enforce it pending the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. The protection of the wild life of this country should be provided. It has already been neglected too long.

Mr. OVERMYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. OVERMYER. Under that treaty there will be no more duck shooting north of the Rio Grande. The only objection that the people of Ohio have is that it entirely prevents any spring duck shooting in our country, and that is the only season of the year when we have any wild ducks.

Mr. RAKER. The point is we have the law and we have the treaty. It has been enforced, it is being enforced, and should be continued. It has been decided to be constitutional by a number of courts. Only two have decided it unconstitutional. It is now before the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a great advantage to this country to protect the migratory birds. We have 69 bird reservations that belong to the Government, and the Government is expending its money, large sums at that, on these reserves, and why should Congress defeat this law by declining to appropriate money to carry it into operation. I am opposed to creating bird reserves, though, out of good agricultural land fit for farming, like some 60,000 acres of the lower Klamath, Cal. and Oreg. But where bird reserves can be properly created and the migratory birds and wild life preserved, it should be done. Congress should see that sufficient funds are appropriated for this purpose. Likewise it should enact a law to fully carry out the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain that I have just referred to.

As to the economical value of it, of course there can be no argument against it; the only question is whether certain localities shall have the right to get the game as it goes there and rests but a short time. This preservation of migratory birds means much to the food products of this country. Everybody who lives on the frontier knows what has been done for the last 10 or 15 years in regard to destroying the wonderful wild life that was valuable for food products in this country. Everybody knows that before the passage of this law migratory birds and their preserves were being eliminated. There are 69 bird preserves now maintained by the Government, and we should not now undertake to destroy the last vestige when the Government is trying to maintain this wonderful product of so much meat value to the people. The House has heretofore refused to strike out this item, and I hope it will do so now, because the law is right and should be enforced, and further, because the whole matter is now in the hands of the Supreme Court for decision and final determination. It is the law, and enforceable and should be enforced, and ample provisions made therefor until determined otherwise. The motion to strike out the paragraph should be defeated, and I have great confidence that this will be the deliberate judgment of the committee.

Mr. LEVER. How much time is remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Four minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OVERMYER] use one minute, and then the gentleman from California one minute.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I can hardly be expected to say what I wanted to say in one minute's time. The people in Ohio are as much interested in the enforcement of the migratory-bird law as the people of any other State. But the effect of enforcing that law is to deprive our people in Ohio entirely of any wild-duck shooting, because the only time we have any wild ducks is during the time of year when shooting is prohibited by the operation of this law. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], who said that we wanted to murder wild ducks by wholesale, is mistaken, because the effect of this law is that the millionaires of the country who can form private clubs in the South can have the duck shooting and go to that section of the country where the ducks are wintering. The boys in our country who can only go hunting a day at a time never have any duck hunting at all.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, the migratory-bird law reminds me that we are a Nation and not an aggregation of States. As a Nation we are interested in the preservation of our birds, and if certain States can not get their share of the bird killing under this kind of legislation, that is hard luck for those States; but the main thing is for us to legislate as national legislators so that the birds will be preserved.

I have been a hunter all my life and I have been, early in my life, what is known as a game hog. I thank the Lord that I have seen the light and have cut out spring shooting and have no desire to have anything more of that sort of special or detrimental privilege under the laws of this Government. I believe our migratory-bird law is framed in the interest of the whole Nation, and it ought to be carried out, and it is my hope and belief that the Supreme Court may find this necessary legislation constitutional.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF ACCOUNTS AND DISBURSEMENTS.

Salaries, Division of Accounts and Disbursements: One chief of division and disbursing clerk, $4,000; 1 supervising auditor, $2,250; 1 cashier and chief clerk, $2,370; 1 deputy disbursing clerk, $2,120; 1 accountant and bookkeeper, $2,000; 2 clerks, class 4; 4 clerks, class 3; 6 clerks, class 2; 5 clerks, class 1; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 clerks, at $900 each; 1 messenger, $720; 1 messenger or messenger boy, $600.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the figures "$2,370," in line 5, page 59, and against the figures "$2,120" in the same line.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I concede both points of order and offer the following amendments which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 5, page 59, in lieu of "$2,370" insert "$2,250," and in lieu of "$2,120" insert "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question respecting the custodian of records and files. Heretofore there has been carried an appropriation for one custodian of records and files.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, by recommendation of the department, the title of that gentleman was changed to one clerk of class 2.

Mr. TILSON. Then he appears now simply as a clerk?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; at the same salary.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS.

Salaries, Division of Publications: One editor, who shall be chief of division, $3,750; 1 editor, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,500; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 2 assistant editors, at $2,000 each; 4 assistant editors, at $1,800 each; 1 assistant editor, $1,600; 1 assistant editor, $1,400; 1 assistant editor in charge of indexing, $2,000; 1 indexer, $1,400; 1 assistant in charge of illustrations, $2,220; 2 draftsmen or photographers, at $1,600 each; 2 draftsmen or photographers, at $1,500 each; 3 draftsmen or photographers, at $1,400 each; 1 draftsman or photographer, $1,300; 8 draftsmen or photographers, at $1,200 each; 1 assistant photographer, $900; 1 lantern-slide colorist, $840; 1 assistant in charge of document section, $2,100; 1 assistant in document section, $1,800; 1 assistant in document section, $1,400; 1 foreman, miscellaneous distribution, $1,500; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 11 clerks, class 1; 16 clerks, at $1,000 each; 40 clerks, at $900 each; 18 clerks, at $840 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $900 each; 7 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 4 skilled laborers, at $780 each; 1 chief folder, $1,200; 17 skilled laborers, messengers, or messenger boys, at $720 each; 1 skilled laborer, $720; 1 folder, $1,000; 2 folders, at $900 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $1,100 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 3 messengers or messenger boys, at $600 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $480 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $420 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 laborer, $840; 2 laborers, at $600 each; 3 charwomen, at $480 each; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $182,390.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the figures "$3,750" in line 14, page 59, and also upon the figures "$2,220" in line 20, page 59, and on the figures "$2,100" in line 1, page 60.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will concede the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point of order on the first item for a moment?

Mr. COX. I am going to make it. I will withhold it, however.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire whether we did not increase the salary of the editor of publications last year, and if so how much?

Mr. LEVER. I think we increased this about $250 last year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire whether there was any estimate made for an increase above the salary now carried of $3,500?

Mr. LEVER. There was not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the committee takes it upon itself to increase salaries that are not estimated for.

Mr. LEVER. The committee ordinarily does not, but the committee is not subservient to the judgment of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not say that the committee should be subservient to the judgment of the Department of Agriculture, but it is almost an invariable rule that committees having charge of salaries of officials connected with the departments will not increase the appropriations for salaries unless they are recommended by the departments.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true, and yet yesterday complaint was made that we did not promote certain people who were not estimated for. The gentleman will recall that.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was as to the general horizontal increase by reason of h. c. l.

Mr. FOSTER. What is h. c. l.?

Mr. STAFFORD Oh, everyone knows about that who has a home to provide for, or who has to pay his board bill at a hotel.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the committee on its own motion, recognizing the peculiar work of this gentleman and his peculiar qualifications and his very great fairness in dealing with Members, for it is through him that we get our documents and bulletins, and the like of that, took it up themselves to increase his salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. His worth was not recognized by the head of the department, however.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order, and I offer the following amendments:

On page 59, line 14, insert in lieu of the figures "$3,750" the figures "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 14, in lieu of "$3,750" insert the figures "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. On the same page, line 20, after the comma in that line, insert the figures "$2,100" instead of the figures "$2,220."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 20, in lieu of "$2,220" insert "$2,100."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. On page 60, line 1, at the end of the line, insert the figures "$2,000" in lieu of those that have been stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 1, after the word "section" insert the figures "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike cut the last word for the purpose of asking a question or two about something that I do not understand. I refer to the News Letter. That is edited by people who are employed under this appropriation, as I understand it?

Mr. LEVER. No; that News Letter is conducted by a gentlemen carried on the roll of the Secretary named Wharton.

Mr. CANNON. As a foundation for asking a few questions, I will be glad to have the Clerk read the article which I have indicated here under the head of "Home economics funds."

The Clerk read as follows:

HOME ECONOMICS FUNDS—THREE-FOURTHS OF A MILLION DOLLARS AVAILABLE FOR EXTENSION WORK AMONG FARM WOMEN.

That the carrying into effect of the provisions of the cooperative extension act has had widespread influence in bringing the knowledge and information of the State colleges of agriculture to women on the farms is evident from the following statistical statement:

"During 1914–15 the total amount spent in home-economics demonstrations was slightly over $320,000, while in 1916–17 over $750,000 was allotted to this work, an increase of over 130 per cent in two years. This money was derived from the United States Department of Agriculture, the State colleges of agriculture, Federal and State cooperative extension act funds, and county and other local sources. In 1916 the allotment of funds for extension work for farm women was derived from the following sources: One hundred and seven thousand dollars from funds appropriated directly to the United States Department of Agriculture, $260,000 from Federal extension act funds, $120,000 from State extension act funds, $32,000 from direct State appropriations in addition to the amount appropriated by the State to offset the Federal cooperative extension funds, $178,000 from county appropriations, and $80,000 from college and other miscellaneous sources.

"A part of this money was used to employ women county agents. The number of counties with women agents has increased during the last three years from 279 to 478. In addition there were employed a large number of home-economics specialists and supervising agents having a field larger than the county. In 1915–16 the total number of home-economics extension workers was 600, of whom 350 were women county agents, the others being the supervising agents and home-economics extension specialists of the State colleges.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I have made a rough calculation here that from the Agricultural Department, under the extension act, the expenditure was $352,000; from direct State appropriations, $152,000; from county appropriations, $250,000; and from college and other miscellaneous funds, $80,000. This is accompanied by a table giving the expenditure in various years. Take the expenditure for the current year, for instance, the year 1916–17, of $755,000, and I find that in 30 States—and I may say that includes probably two-thirds of the population—the expenditure was $155,000 and in 15 States $601,000. I have been looking through this bill to see by what authority of law these expenditures were made. It may be that it is all correct and proper, and yet as I glance through the extension law it seems to me that the apportionment is to be made according to rural population. Am I correct about that?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is correct about that. I will say this to the gentleman, that I have an idea the reason that 30 States are spending certain amounts of money for home economics and the other States are not doing so, may be due to the fact that those States in which no money is being expended for home economics have not desired that that money be expended for that purpose. The gentleman will recall that the provisions of the Agricultural extension act require that the moneys shall be expended upon projects agreed upon in advance by the agricultural colleges of the State and the Federal Department of Agriculture. It is entirely possible that the 30 States—in fact, I am sure it is a fact—have themselves requested, and that request has been agreed to here in Washington, that certain sums out of those funds shall be used for the teaching of home economics, while the others have not done so.

Mr. CANNON. Still, how can you change the provisions of the law by an agreement between the Agricultural Department and a State or States?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman did not quite catch the meaning of the explanation I tried to make. A State in agreement with the Federal department may spend all the appropriation allotted to it under the extension law for extension work and none of it for home economics at all, or it may spend all of it for home economic work and none of it for extension work. But the proportion of the amount that shall go to one class of work and the proportion that shall go to another class of work is a matter of agreement between the extension league of the State and the Agricultural Department, and that is how you get your difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has expired.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman desires more time, I will ask it.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire any more except to find out what the facts are.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Does that make it clear to the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. Any report I have been able to find does not make it clear. But if there be under the law, and under any proper construction of the law, a waiver upon the part of some of the States that have not used the money that comes to them under the provision of the law, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. LEVER. Any State may waive its share of this money by refusing to meet the appropriations of the Federal department by State appropriation, except $10,000, which is appropriated outright and unconditionally to each State. But I have no idea that any of these funds have been waived, as would appear from the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. What has happened is about this, and let me illustrate by citing my own State. We will say that the extension fund of the Federal Government to South Carolina is $100,000 for the purposes of teaching agriculture by the extension method and teaching home economics. Now, it is entirely possible and it is entirely in order under the law that not 1 cent of that $100,000 would be used in South Carolina for the teaching of home economics, but all of it would be used for the teaching of agriculture through the extension method.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman, it seems to me, has answered the question that was running in my mind.

Mr. LEVER. I am very glad to have been able to do so.

Mr. CANNON. I have failed to catch on to the law as it is in any report I have been able to find, but the explanation of the gentleman, it seems to me, is satisfactory.

Mr. LEVER. I am sure what I have said is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman has made any answer to the question at all, because, if I understood the statement of my colleague, it was to this effect, namely, that out of $755,000 used during the current fiscal year only $106,000——

Mr. CANNON. One hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars to 30 States that have over two-thirds of the population.

Mr. MADDEN. And the remaining part of the $755,000, $600,000, has been used in 18 States with one-third of the population.

Mr. LEVER. That might be possible, and still my statement covers it.

Mr. CANNON. That is what I said and that is what the statement shows.

Mr. MADDEN. The answer of the gentleman from South Carolina to my colleague was just the opposite.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is mistaken. I mean to say the total fund from the Federal Treasury to give to the States to teach home-economics work and to teach agriculture by extension methods. The States, then, and the Federal Government work together and apportion the fund between themselves, say, 75 per cent for home economics and 25 per cent for agricultural extension work. It is a matter of choice with the State largely, and was deliberately made so in the law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have some other facts that perhaps would be apt under another pending bill, but I ran across this, and I thought I would ask what the explanation was.

Mr. LEVER. I hope I have made it clear to the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For photographic equipment and for photographic materials and artists' tools and supplies, $17,000: Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, under such rules and regulations and subject to such conditions as he may prescribe, to loan, rent, or sell copies of films; all moneys received from such rentals or sales to be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, particularly on the proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve a point of order if the gentleman does not.

Mr. COX. What I want is a brief explanation of what the purpose is.

Mr. LEVER. The purpose of the new language, the proviso, is to enable the department, with the approval of the law, to loan to educational institutions motion-picture films for use in their work. The department has been experimenting somewhat in the last two years as to the value of motion-picture shows in the teaching of agriculture in certain of the large agricultural schools and colleges of the country, and they have insisted that the work is very helpful.

Now, a great many of these institutions are requesting either that they be given these films by loan or that they be permitted to purchase them at the cost of production.

Mr. COX. One more question: Has the department heretofore sold any of these films or loaned them?

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. COX. Then, this is a new departure?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman be willing to strike out the word "hereafter"?

Mr. LEVER. I do not object.

Mr. COX. Then I would only make the point on the word "hereafter," and let the department try it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the department wishes to go into the business of making photographic films to supply the trade or institutions throughout the country, and I suppose that is the purpose of the increase from $6,000 to $17,000 in this item.

Mr. LEVER. Part of the increase goes to that work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Substantially $10,000 of it is for that purpose.

Mr. LEVER. Ten thousand dollars. The gentleman is right. The department desires to be permitted to loan films to institutions of education that are interested in agriculture.

The department, as I said in answer to the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], has been for a few years doing some work in the way of teaching agriculture with the use of moving pictures. It is not intended, of course, to go into this matter on a very large scale; but the statement was made to the committee that the manufacture of motion-picture films is a rather expensive thing, and that many of the educational institutions engaged in teaching agriculture are very anxious to have some of these films, either by loan or sale, they not being able themselves to manufacture them. That is the purpose of it, frankly.

Mr. HELGESEN. But, Mr. Chairman, not only that, but the demands for these films have become so numerous that they have not got them to loan, and so they propose to make them and sell them and turn the money back into the fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is to say, they are going into the business of manufacturing films for sale?

Mr. LEVER. Not for the public generally, but for educational institutions.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no limitation as to whom they may sell or rent them. They may be sold or rented generally.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I happen to know of one institution that wanted to borrow the film that shows the development of the sardine from the time that the herring is taken out of the Passamaquoddy Bay until it goes to market as a sardine. This institution wanted to study that particular phase of the food problem. It made application, as I happen to know, to the Department of Agriculture for the rental of it, purely for the sake of showing it to the school.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there should be some limitation on this proviso to educational institutions, and not allow the department to go into the business of manufacturing films and selling them to the trade generally—to all who may apply.

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman be satisfied with that if we should insert after the word "films" the words "to educational institutions only"?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. Let us try it out with that limitation.

Mr. LEVER. I think the committee has no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Why not say "for educational purposes"?

Mr. STAFFORD. Every film is claimed to be for educational purposes, especially films of this character.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Only such institutions want them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I suppose every moving-picture house could apply to the department. We are not going into the business of manufacturing films.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from South Carolina agrees to that limitation——

Mr. LEVER. I have not agreed to it——

Mr. HAWLEY. We ought not to confine it to educational institutions strictly, because some institution engaged in dairy work or some other agricultural institution might want the films to illustrate their work above all others.

Mr. LEVER. I will remark, if my colleague will permit me, that the broad interpretation of the term "educational institution" would cover the situation that he has in mind.

Mr. HAWLEY. I doubt it very much. An educational institution is a very well defined term.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will permit me, I do not think there is going to be any abuse of this privilege. Let us strike out the word "hereafter" and see what takes place.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I have been here too long not to know how rapidly these things grow and how the departments wish to increase their work.

Mr. LEVER. Let us see what it is next year.

Mr. STAFFORD. It might then be considered as a work in progress.

Mr. COX. Strike out the word "loan." Make them pay for it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will withdraw his objection, I will submit this amendment: "to educational institutions only."

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest that we add this to it, if the gentleman will give consideration to it: "and not organized for profit."

Mr. LEVER. Yes; "not organized for profit." I am willing to accept that; that is, a public institution.

Mr. HELGESEN. How about the National and State agricultural bureaus? They are not strictly educational institutions.

Mr. LEVER. I think they would be so construed. If the gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his point——

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the proposed amendment?

Mr. LEVER. "To educational institutions only, and not organized for profit."

Mr. STAFFORD. That is acceptable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 61, line 4, by striking out the word "hereafter," and at the end of line 6, following the word "films," insert the words "to educational institutions, not organized for profit."

Mr. HAWLEY. Would the gentleman object to inserting in the ameidment he proposes these words, "or associations engaged in agricultural education"?

Mr. LEVER. No; I think that is perfectly proper. Let them be stated to the Clerk and become a part of my amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. "Or associations engaged in agricultural education."

The Clerk read as follows:

Or associations engaged in promoting agricultural education.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman incorporate that as a part of his amendment?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, let us have it reported, so that we can see how it will read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 61, line 4, by striking out the word "hereafter" and inserting after the word "films," in line 6, the following: "to educational institutions only, not organized for profit, or associations for agricultural education."

Mr. MADDEN. The words "not organized for profit" ought to follow the two propositions and be the last words in the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. That is a good suggestion. Let those words "not organized for profit" come at the end.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make that transposition.

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Crop Estimates: For all necessary expenses for collecting, compiling, abstrating, analyzing, summarizing, and interpreting data relating to agriculture; for making and publishing periodically crop and live-stock estimates, including acreage, yield, and value of farm products, as follows: Provided, That hereafter the Monthly Crop Report shall be printed and distributed on or before the 12th day of each month.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the proviso. I should like to inquire the purpose of placing that limitation on the activities of the department in the publication of the monthly crop report. Can you not depend on the department heads to get out the publication as soon as they can, at a time when it will be of the most service to its readers?

Mr. LEVER. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the department itself has found a great deal of difficulty in getting its crop reports printed at all at the Government Printing Office, in time to be of any value, during the months in which they are issued. The department, in delicate and diplomatic language, asked that this proviso be inserted here for the purpose of compelling the Printing Office to print these monthly crop reports within a reasonable time, which we understand they have not been doing heretofore. That is the real purpose of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the proviso.

Mr. LEVER. I concede it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FESS. I have heard a good deal of criticism in my own community about the accuracy of these crop reports. How much reliability have they?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have not looked into the matter of the accuracy of the department's estimates on grain within the last 12 months. I am not familiar with them. I am familiar with the bureau's estimates on cotton. I think during a period of some 10 years they have been out of line with the actual facts as disclosed by the commercial movement not over 1½ or 2 per cent. Sometimes they overestimate a little and sometimes underestimate a little. I think their last year's report was within 1 per cent of accuracy.

Mr. FESS. I had a conversation with one of our large grain dealers, and I quoted to him the crop reports, and he said that they were not reliable. I was wondering whether this statement had any foundation.

Mr. LEVER. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I am inclined to doubt whether the department has developed its machinery for gathering statistics on cereals as well as it has for gathering statistics on cotton. I wonder if that is not the judgment of other members of the committee? I can not say certainly just how accurate the reports are on grain. I have a pretty fair idea about cotton.

Mr. HELGESEN. Their statement to the committee is that they are seldom off more than 3 per cent.

Mr. LEVER. That is pretty close.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, library, Department of Agriculture: One librarian, $2,200; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 5 clerks, class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,080 each; 3 clerks, at $1,020 each; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 7 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 junior library assistant, messenger, or messenger boy, $720; 1 junior library assistant or messenger boy, $660; 3 junior library assistants or messenger boys, at $600 each; 1 messenger, messenger boy, or laborer, $480; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; in all, $33,260.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on line 25, page 62, on the figures "$2,200."

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEVER. In place of the figures stricken out I move to insert "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 62, line 25, strike out "$2,200" and insert "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATES RELATIONS SERVICE.

Salaries, States Relations Service: One director, $4,500; 1 chief clerk, $2,120; 1 financial clerk, $2,120; 1 clerk or proof reader, $1,800; 3 clerks, class 4; 3 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,500; 10 clerks, class 2; 22 clerks, class 1; 23 clerks, at $1,000 each; 27 clerks, at $900 each; 8 clerks, at $840 each; 4 clerks, at $720 each; 1 library cataloguer, $900; 2 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $720 each; 4 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 10 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 1 messenger, messenger boy, or laborer, $360; 3 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $300 each; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 4 laborers or charwomen, at $480 each; 9 laborers or charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $135,320.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the figures "$2,120" where they occur in two places, in line 16 on page 64.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEVER. I move to insert in place of the figures stricken out, in the two places in line 16, the figures "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 64, in line 16, strike out "$2,120" in the two places where it occurs and insert in lieu thereof in each place "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, States Relations Service: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," the sums apportioned to the several States and Territories, to be paid quarterly in advance, $720,000;

To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved march 16, 1906, entitled "An act to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations and regulating the expenditure thereof," the sums apportioned to the several States and Territories, to be paid quarterly in advance, $720,000: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 shall be paid to each State and Territory under this act;

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of the above acts and the act approved May 8, 1914, entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," relative to their administration and for the administration of agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, including the employment of clerks, assistants, and other persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere, freight and express charges, official traveling expenses, office fixtures, supplies, apparatus, telegraph and telephone service, gas, electric current, and rent outside of the District of Columbia, $68,500; and the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe the form of the annual financial statement required under the above acts, ascertain whether the expenditures are in accordance with their provisions, coordinate the work of the Department of Agriculture with that of the State agricultural colleges and experiment stations in the lines authorized in said acts, and make report thereon to Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to find out which one of these acts is the so-called Lever Act. Is it the act of May 8, 1914?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What appropriation is made under that act?

Mr. LEVER. The act itself makes an appropriation of $1,000,000 each year for a certain number of years, conditioned upon certain things happening.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not provided for in this bill?

Mr. LEVER. No; it is not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In what bill is it provided for?

Mr. LEVER. The statute itself makes a continuing appropriation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That comes in another appropriation bill?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is a permanent annual appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. A permanent continuing appropriation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that $1,000,000 contained in the $25,000,000 appropriated in this bill?

Mr. LEVER. No; it is not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, it is $1,000,000 in addition, for agricultural education, besides what this bill provides for?

Mr. LEVER. It will be more than that this year, to be frank with the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. It will be $2,080,000.

Mr. LEVER. It will be $2,080,000 more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The total provided in this bill is upward of $25,000,000?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Smith-Lever bill would provide $2,080,000 for the next fiscal year?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Smith-Hughes bill should pass, an additional provision would be made for agricultural education purposes, and that would be in addition to the appropriation made here.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state briefly, because he is entirely familiar with the subject, in what way the education provided for in the Smith-Lever bill differs from that provided for in the Smith-Hughes bill so far as it pertains to agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. I will say, frankly, to the gentleman that I have not had an opportunity on account of the work in the committee to give much attention to the details of the Smith-Hughes educational vocation bill, although I am strongly for it. I think, likely, the gentleman from Ohio and I together can give the gentleman the information. The system provided for in the agriculture extension bill is the teaching of agriculture and home economics through demonstration methods outside of the school or college.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The teaching is directly to the farmer himself?

Mr. LEVER. Directly to the farmer himself, on his own farm.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, the educator goes out to the farm?

Mr. LEVER. The educator is an itinerant teacher, and under the Hughes bill he is, you might say, a stationary teacher.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Under the Smith-Hughes bill he operates at the institution or school which receives the advantage of the appropriation?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. TOWNER. And it might be said that one is almost exclusively the teaching of adults and the other of juveniles.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; under the extension act it is the teaching of adults largely, but not entirely, while under the Smith-Hughes bill it is juvenile.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I wanted brought out.

Mr. HELGESEN. One is an industrial bill and the other is agricultural.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, but they both pertain to agriculture. One-half of the Smith-Hughes bill appropriation is to go for the education of pupils in either agricultural schools or colleges who receive the benefit of the appropriation. The Smith-Lever bill, as I understand it, provides for appropriation for instructors to go out under the direction of the Department of Agriculture to teach the farmer on the farm the things he ought to know.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; there is a provision in the extension act which prohibits any of the funds being used within the institutions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am bringing the question up now because I think it would be worth five minutes' time on the part of some gentleman to explain whether or not there is any duplication of work. This is a matter that may be discussed later on.

Mr. LEVER. I would say to my friend that with my partial understanding of the provisions in the Smith-Hughes bill and my full understanding of the extension act that I do not feel that there can be possibly any duplication of work, unless the extension act is deliberately violated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, there is no provision in the Smith-Lever bill for the education or instruction of anyone beyond the farm?

Mr. LEVER. No; except there is a provision for teaching home economics to the farm women and girls.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not go into any other industry but agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. No.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield, the Smith-Lever bill is purely an extension education.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To the farmer exclusively—on the farm exclusively.

Mr. FESS. Yes; and will be applied primarily to the adult, but is not exclusive of children getting the information through the adults; while the Hughes bill is limited to teaching in the schools pupils not under 14, with a provision that part of the time they are to be out in the field in demonstration work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but the point I wish to emphasize is that the Smith-Lever bill makes appropriation for the benefit of the farmer directly, and exclusively for the farmer, whereas the so-called Smith-Hughes bill, with which the gentleman from Ohio is very familiar, gives one opportunity at least for the child not on the farm to obtain a vocational education. It is the only bill we have before us that makes any provision for the education of the child in a vocation that is not agricultural.

Mr. FESS. That is right.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman will remember that he opposed an amendment to the bill that would insure vocational education in trade and industry to the people in the cities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not, except as it pertained to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin limiting it to 20 per cent of the children affected. I would like to say further to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I am wholly in favor of vocational education for the boy and girl in the city—that is what I am contending for—but I am making the point that we have a double action here in favor of the boy on the farm.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I fear that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may go away with a misapprehension as to the money appropriated under the Lever law, taking the answer given by the gentleman that it was used for the farmer alone. A part of the Lever money is used for the employment of agents to organize boys' and girls' clubs, or young people being taught to do farm work which they are able to do and girls some of the things that they would be taught by teachers of home economics.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman made that statement, for it helps to a better understanding of the situation. I will ask if there is any provision of law, or any other bill, which provides for the formation of clubs for boys and girls in cities who might be kept off the streets and be educated in some useful occupation at Government expense?

Mr. HELGESEN. There certainly is. Take the canning industry, for instance. Girls in the cities want to know how to can fruit just as well as girls on the farm, and they can join the canning clubs.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is very nice, but the gentleman limits it to the canning industry.

Mr. HELGESEN. Oh, no; I simply cited that as an illustration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean to say that any of the Smith-Lever appropriation money could be applied to the formation of boys' and girls' clubs in any urban community?

Mr. HELGESEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from South Carolina indorse that statement?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from North Dakota is mistaken as to the larger cities, but this work can be done in small rural towns.

Mr. HELGESEN. I would say this: Of course, if they figure on New York or Philadelphia as the only great cities, that might be true, but there are cities in the West smaller where that can be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Within the 2,500 population limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. We want to get through with the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that several of us have been absent on committee work this morning and the bill has made no greater progress by reason of that fact. [Laughter.] What I wanted to know was whether the Smith-Lever appropriations are made for the benefit of the people of Alaska, Hawaii, the people of Porto Rico or Guam?

Mr. LEVER. No; none of those funds go there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Smith-Lever law provides for only the United States proper?

Mr. LEVER. For continental United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] whether any provision is made for Alaska in the Smith-Hughes bill, or for any of the Territories?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it intended to exclude Alaska?

Mr. FESS. I think it mentions the States, simply.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], whom I am glad to see here to-day, was yesterday making a criticism upon this bill as a whole, or upon the appropriations in the bill, and has just now been engaged in making an implied criticism upon the Smith-Lever bill upon the ground that it is an appropriation for the benefit of a peculiar and particular class, namely, the farmers of the country. This statement is based upon an entire misapprehension as to the effect and purpose of the Agricultural appropriation bill. Instead of being entirely for the benefit of the farmer, it is largely and principally for the benefit of those unfortunate individuals, like my friend from Pennsylvania, who live in the large cities. The object and purpose of the Agricultural appropriation bill is to increase the production of farm products, thereby to lessen the cost of living and make it easier and cheaper for the people to live in the large cities and buy the necessities of life. That is the main purpose of it. It only incidentally benefits the farmer, and the farmer does not get by any means the chief benefits from this bill. The larger their crops are, as a rule, the less the farmer gets for them, and it is only by reason of the fact that with a large crop he is able to have plenty of feed with which to supply his stock of animals that he gets very much benefit from an increased production. The benefits of this bill, the benefits of any bill for the purpose of increasing the products of the farm, are reaped almost entirely by the people who live off the farm.

The farmer, however, is broad minded enough to take this into consideration, and willing that other people should benefit from it as well as himself. I might say as an illustration of what I have said, that although we have a small cotton crop this year, the amount that will be received from it by the farmer will be immensely larger than ever before. If I am wrong in this, I would be glad to have some gentleman from the cotton States correct me. I know that when we have an immense corn crop in Iowa and in other States, the farmer as a rule does not receive as much for the crop as he does in a year of a small crop, and it is because the crop is smaller this year that the farmers of Iowa and others in the Mississippi Valley are getting so high a price for their corn.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I read a statement in the newspapers to-day that the aggregate value of the crops of the United States for the past year was $9,000,000,000, something more than $2,000,000,000 more than in any year before, notwithstanding all of the crops were smaller than they were before.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That, gentlemen, is correct, and it is largely because of the decreased yield. I once heard a farmer who was experienced in raising hogs say that if the hog cholera could be entirely extinguished there would be no profit in raising hogs. I doubt that statement, but in any event, for the purpose of enabling the people who live in the cities, like my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], to buy their pork and beef cheaper, we are all willing, and ought to be, to make these large appropriations in this bill for the purpose of increasing the production of the farm. There is no bill before this Congress which so benefits every class of society as does the Agricultural appropriation bill, which we now have before us. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the theory for inserting in connection with the enforcement of the Lever law the administrative enforcement with reference to the experiment stations in the insular possessions?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it seems that the expenses of the enforcement of the station act have heretofore been carried in this item, but the solicitor has held that there is some question as to the authority to do that, and the new language was inserted to make sure that the authority was here.

Mr. MANN. The solicitor was plainly correct. This item only provided for the administration of the Lever law. The gentleman says that as a matter of fact. This division did administer the experiment stations in the insular possessions?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why should there be an increase in the appropriation in this item? Is it because of the increase in the permanent appropriation?

Mr. LEVER. No. There is an increase of $10,000 in this item which is to be used for the purpose of establishing an additional experiment station in Alaska. It was brought to the attention of the committee that there was great need of a station in the Matanuska Valley, about 250 miles north of the Fairbanks station and on the line of the new Alaskan railroad. It seems they have something like 1,200,000 acres.

Mr. MANN. The new Alaskan railroad will not be finished next year.

Mr. LEVER. I do not know when it will be finished.

Mr. MANN. It may be a very good thing to establish these agricultural experiment stations in Alaska. If we had enough of them up there, they would raise sufficient vegetables to feed the men who operate the stations. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. The testimony before the committee was that at some of these stations where they were making their experiments they had proven that they could raise potatoes in large quantities and made a fair showing on barley and wheat.

Mr. MANN. Why do they not?

Mr. LEVER. They are.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they are not, except at the experiment stations.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman will understand that Alaska is just about in the same latitude as Norway and Sweden, and there is no question but that you are going to develop agriculture there some of these days when the necessity comes for it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they will develop a little agriculture in a few places, raising barley, possibly wheat, maybe some grass, but never to any extent. However, that is neither here nor there. Under what authority in this item do they establish a new experiment station when this is only in reference to the administration of agricultural colleges? This item does not carry the appropriation for the insular possession stations.

Mr. LEVER. I have been trying to find here my notes on this proposition. I find I am talking about an entirely different paragraph. The $10,000 increase in this item is due to the fact that the administrative expenses of enforcing the Smith-Lever Act are largely increasing.

Mr. MANN. That is largely because the permanent appropriation has increased?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; it is on account of the increase in the appropriation. My statement was erroneous, because I was looking at the wrong paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For farmers' cooperative demonstration work outside of the cotton belt, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $578,240.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here is an item of more than a half million dollars, a very large sum of money to any man living in the city who now has to pay farmers' prices for the necessaries of life. Five hundred and seventy-eight thousand dollars is more than half a million, as I observed a moment ago, which, if it came up in the ordinary way affecting other industries, would probably bring the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to his feet with a point of order, if he could make it. It would doubtless be held to be too enormous an amount of money to go into the education or employment of anyone who was interested in the development of industries or who might in some way or other be controlled by the hideous corporations. But this item is for farmers' demonstration work outside of the cotton belt, and that is different. The cotton belt is provided for in this bill, and always is—from the boll weevil to the army worm. We make ample appropriations to provide for everything attached to cotton, from the time it is put into the ground until it is woven into the cloth. We look after the tariff on cotton goods, but we have no right under the Constitution to levy an export tax on cotton, and therefore collect very little out of cotton to promote the revenues of the Government of the United States. But, be that as it may, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has made a violent attack upon the great cities, and I must defend them. He seems to think there is reason for congratulation upon the part of the farmer of the country that he has got the city man down at the present time, and is making enormous profits out of the products of the farm. The gentleman from Iowa chuckles over the position in which the city dweller finds himself and is glad he is a representative of a truly prosperous people.

If I am not mistaken, he had this speech in his system yesterday, but was unable to deliver it at that time. He came in after the battle was over and was unable to speak of his unquenchable love of the "downtrodden farmer of Iowa," that far-seeing farmer who is getting from $200 to $300 an acre for his land, while we can sell it to him for $50, $60, or $70 in New Jersey, Delaware, or Virginia, and who is riding in automobiles and having the time of his life, receiving the highest price he ever got for his grain and the highest price he ever got for his other products, due to the fact, whether he knows it or not, that he is selling most of them to the warring peoples of Europe, while we of the great cities are paying European war prices for what we consume. The gentleman has a delightful view of a very intricate and troublesome home situation.

In calling attention to the money we appropriate for the farmer's education, we may also consider the many new jobs that will be provided for in this $578,240 that is given in a lump sum for the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere looking after the cotton belt; and a little further on in this bill we find an item which proposes to put into effect the grain-grades act. It may be all right. I shall support it, but it provides for the expenditure of $519,140 in a lump sum by the Secretary of Agriculture, without specification. The Secretary may employ such persons as he pleases, at any old salary he proposes to fix, at the expense of all the people, no matter whether we are paying $1 a dozen for eggs in the great cities or whether the Iowa farmer is riding around in his automobile or not. I do not know why I have been compelled to make this speech except to pacify the gentleman from Iowa. I know how earnest the gentleman from Iowa was to get his speech in the RECORD to-day, the two gentlemen from Nebraska having got theirs in yesterday, and I am sorry the gentleman from Iowa was so unfortunate as to come in after the war was over, only to find himself too late. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, including the erection of buildings, the preparation, illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins, and all other necessary expenses, $155,000, as follows: Alaska, $60,000, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available for the location, equipment, and maintenance of an agricultural experiment station in the Matanuska Valley; Hawaii, $40,000; Porto Rico, $40,000; and Guam, $15,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated for the experiment station in Hawaii $5,000 may be used in agricultural extension work in Hawaii.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from South Carolina able to say how much money was received from the sale of products raised at the Alaska Experiment Station in any fiscal year recently?

Mr. LEVER. My recollection is that a statement was given to us last year to the effect that the receipts of the sales at the Alaska station amounted to about $8,000; about that.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recollect whether that is for the year past, or is this recent information?

Mr. LEVER. I thought about it last night; but I am pretty sure my recollection is correct on that. It impressed me at the time.

Mr. MANN. Well, we appropriated for this year $48,000. I think perhaps that that was an increase. They do not raise very much. There is not a very large variety of experiments up in Alaska. They tell us how extremely easy it is to raise large crops of potatoes, barley, and, I believe, some raspberries, and maybe strawberries and currants, or something of the sort. They do not have the same problems that you have in a country where there is a more varied climate. Yet it would appear that for an expenditure of $48,000 they were able to raise $8,000 worth of stuff. They do not use it. They do not raise much that they can eat. They do not have much use for it if they do raise it, except to sell, and it sells at a very high price, even the hay that they raise.

I wonder how profitable it is to go ahead with another experiment station. It is proposed to have one at Matanuska Valley, at a cost of $10,000. Well, that would produce probably one-sixth of $10,000, whatever that may be—$1,833 perhaps. I really would like to know what value this is.

Mr. LEVER. Well, I will let the gentleman complete his statement, so that I can make a connected statement in reply.

Mr. MANN. There may be no objection to having this experiment station; but, after all, facts are facts. The experiment station is really "experimenting." They have a great number of small plats, but there is no occasion for having more such experiment stations in Alaska. I take it that is what they do. Now, they want to put this new station in Matanuska Valley. Ten thousand dollars will not go very far. The railroad is not finished, and nobody knows how soon it will be. I do not know whether anybody will ever go on it or not. I heard a gentleman the other day, who had been up there quite a while—a Government official, by the way—say that when that railroad was built it was perfectly evident to anyone who knew anything about it that it would not pay, as far as freight is concerned; but that if you could get everybody in this country to go up there as sightseers and pay passenger fares and travel around and see Mount McKinley, the road might be made profitable. Of course that is too silly for restatement.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that the railroad is into the Matanuska Valley now, and that the Matanuska Valley is a very large valley, in which it is expected that extensive agricultural operations may be carried on. Does not the gentleman think that it would be of value if we had an experiment station there to see whether or not these various crops could be raised?

The gentleman also said that those experiment stations were not necessarily experiment stations.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not make that statement. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not want to misquote the gentleman, but, as I understood him, he said that the experiment stations there are not like the experiment stations in this country.

Mr. MANN. They are not.

Mr. TOWNER. And that, as a matter of fact, they were not being carried on in that way.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I said the experiments were necessarily very limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. There are not many things that they can experiment with up there or that they do experiment with as they do where the climate is different. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] says the railroad is in the Matanuska Valley. The railroad is not finished and is not in operation and will not be, so far as doing any business up there is concerned, until they open the coal fields, and that is not going to be done right away.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman think, for the very reason that the climate is peculiar up there, and that they have not carried on extensive agricultural operations, that they should have an experiment station there to see if these various crops can be raised before they invite settlers to come in there and experiment on the land?

Mr. MANN. I was speaking of the agricultural experiment station that is there. That costs $48,000 a year. That station claims that it can raise potatoes and barley and things of that kind at a great profit. Does it result in profit when on an expenditure of $48,000 they raise products of a value of $8,000? That demonstrates that it is pretty nearly useless.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's statement about the railroads is very interesting, especially in view of the fact that an Army officer made a statement before the Committee on Military Affairs the other day to the effect that when the railroad was completed it would not be worth anything without roads, and he was asking the Committee on Military Affairs for an appropriation of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000——

Mr. MANN. Of course, the railroads will not be worth anything until roads are built to enable people to get to them.

Mr. COX. He was asking the Military Committee for an appropriation of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 to improve the roads in Alaska, so as to make the railroads worth something when they were built.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman from Illinois reserve the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I did reserve the point of order. I will not make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering: One director, who shall be a scientist and have charge of all scientific and technical work, $5,000; 1 editor, $2,500; 1 draftsman or clerk, $1,920; 1 clerk, $1,900; 1 model maker, $1,800; 2 clerks, class 4, 5 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk or editorial clerk, $1,600; 1 clerk, $1,500; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,440; 1 clerk or instrument maker, $1,440; 1 clerk or tabulator, $1,440; 1 clerk, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,380; 2 clerks, at $1,320 each; 4 clerks, at $1,260 each; 6 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk or editorial clerk, $1,200; 1 draftsman, $1,320; 1 clerk or draftsman, $1,200; 1 clerk or draftsman, $900; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,200; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,000; 2 clerks, at $1,140 each; 2 clerks, at $1,080 each; 1 clerk, $1,020; 8 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk or skilled laborer, $1,000; 8 clerks, at $900 each; 1 mechanician, $1,680; 1 clerk or instrument maker, $1,200; 1 lantern-slide colorist, $1,320; 1 mechanic, $1,200; 1 carpenter, $1,200; 1 laboratory aid, $960; 1 messenger, laborer, or laboratory helper, $840; 1 messenger or laborer, $840; 2 messengers, laborers, or laboratory helpers, at $720 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $660 each; 6 messengers, laborers, or messenger boys, at $600 each; 1 skilled laborer, $720; 1 fireman, $720; 7 laborers, messenger boys, or charwomen, at $480 each; 7 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $95,860.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the figures "$5,000," in line 9, page 69.

Mr. LEVER. That is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, Mr. Chairman. I wish to inquire whether the provision for the editor is the salary that he is now receiving, "one editor, $2,500," in line 9? It is a new item in this bill.

Mr. LEVER. It is a transfer from the lump-sum fund at the same salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. LEVER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 9, page 69, in lieu of the figures stricken out, insert the figures "$4,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 69, line 9, after the word "work," insert the figures "$4,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of the best methods of road making, especially ordinary sand-clay and dirt roads, and the best kinds of road-making materials, and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance, $141,780.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point some information in reference to the development of road building in the United States. It is directly applicable to this provision of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Why should we not have the information given us on the floor?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I do not want to take up the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain matter which he refers to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is well known by the membership of this House that I am and have heretofore been a strong advocate of Government aid to "good roads." The Office of Public Roads, under the direction of Dr. Logan W. Page, is doing great work. I desire to print as a part of my remarks in this connection the following article, showing the development in road building in the United States:

OUR COUNTRY ROADS—IMPROVED HIGHWAYS INCREASE AT RATE OF 16,000 MILES A YEAR, SAYS UNCLE SAM.

There were about 2,452,000 miles of public roads in this country outside the limits of incorporated towns and cities January 1, 1916, according to information that has just been compiled by Uncle Sam's experts of the Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering. Of this number about 277,000 miles, or 11.3 per cent, were improved with some form of surfacing. It is said by the men who have just completed this survey that the mileage of surfaced roads has been increasing at the rate of about 16,000 miles a year, and in 1915 approximately one-half of this increase was made under the supervision of State highway departments. In addition, these departments supervised the maintenance of nearly 52,000 miles of main and trunk-line roads.

An increase of from approximately $80,000,000 per year in 1904 to about $282,000,000 in 1915 has been noted in the country for expenditures for road and bridge work, which is an increase of more than 250 per cent. The expenditure of State funds during this same period increased from about $2,550,000 to more than $53,000,000. In addition, more than $27,000,000 of local funds was spent under State supervision in 1915, bringing the total road and bridge expenditures managed by the States to $80,514,699. This amount is greater than the total expenditure for roads and bridges from all sources in 1904, according to the experts of the office.

Tracing the growth in importance of the State highway departments, the officials found them to be rapid. The first of these agencies was created in 1891 in New Jersey, and now some form of highway department exists in every State in the Union except Indiana, South Carolina, and Texas. Since their inception it is said that these departments have expended to January 1, 1916, an aggregate of $265,350,825 in State funds for roads and bridge construction, maintenance, and administration. They had constructed more than 50,000 miles of roads in cooperation with the States, more than 40,000 miles of which were surfaced.

The statistics gathered by the good-roads division experts show that the cash road and bridge expenditures of the United States averaged only $28 per mile of rural roads in 1904. In 1915 this average had grown to $109 per mile. New Jersey led all other States, both in 1904 and in 1915, with $221 and $475 per mile, respectively. Nevada made the least expenditure in both years—$3.72 per mile in 1904 and $17 per mile in 1915.

I call attention also to the following article, showing reduction in cost of hauling over improved roads, demonstrating the immediate benefits derived from improved-road construction:

IMPROVED ROADS BRING LOWER HAULING COSTS—TESTS MADE BY UNCLE SAM IN EIGHT COUNTIES IN DIFFERENT SECTIONS SHOW ANNUAL SAVING OF $627,409.

Improvement of roads in eight selected counties in different sections of the country resulted in the aggregate in a total gross annual saving in hauling costs of $627,409, according to recent economic studies made by the Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering of the United States Department of Agriculture. The cost of haulage for the group of counties is lower since the roads were improved, it was found, even when charges are made in the comparative computations for interest on bonds and annual maintenance costs. The results of the studies, which extended from 1909 to 1915, and which included other effects of improved highways than those on traffic, are shown in Department of Agriculture Bulletin 393, recently published.

The eight counties in which the studies were made are Spotsylvania, Dinwiddie, Lee, and Wise Counties, Va.; Franklin County, N. Y.; Dallas County, Ala.; Lauderdale County, Miss.; and Manatee County, Fla. These counties were selected because they had just issued bonds for road improvement when it was decided to make the studies, and it would therefore be possible to cover the road improvements from outset to completion

The average gross annual saving in hauling costs due to the road improvements in these eight counties was found to be 17.9 cents per ton-mile, while the net saving was found to be 11.6 cents. The investigators point out in the bulletin that an actual cash saving to the amount indicated is not effected, but that this is the indicated saving when the time of workers and use of draft animals and equipment are given cash values at the rates prevailing in the several communities.

EFFECTS BY COUNTIES.

In Spotsylvania County, Va., a bond issue of $173,000 was provided and 76 miles of road were improved. The average loads hauled in a two-horse wagon increased materially after the roads were improved, and ton-mile costs dropped from 30 cents to 13.7 cents. This meant a gross ton-mile saving of 16.3 cents, or a net ton-mile saving, when charges were made for interest on bonds and maintenance of roads, of 14.9 cents. The gross total annual saving in the county is, therefore, approximately $150,000; and when deductions are made for interest and maintenance costs the annual indicated net saving is $130,670.

In Dinwiddie County, Va., a bond issue of $105,000 was provided, and the State contributed in addition nearly $40,000 worth of convict labor. The improved road mileage at the completion of the study was 101 miles. Average loads for a two-horse wagon increased from about 2,000 pounds to about 3,200 pounds, and ton-mile costs decreased from 30 cents to 15 cents. The net ton-mile saving is 13.7 cents, and the indicated gross saving for the county is $124,970.

In Lee County, Va., a fund of $364,000 was provided by bonds and the State contributed labor worth more than $21,000. Ninety-nine miles of road were improved. Average loads increased from 1,500 to 4,000 pounds, and ton-mile costs were reduced from 40 cents to 20 cents, with a net ton-mile saving of 10.6 cents. The gross annual saving for the county was $59,400.

In Franklin County, N. Y., bonds to the amount of $500,000 were issued and 135 miles of road were improved. Average loads increased from about 2,400 pounds to 5,557 pounds. Ton-mile costs dropped from 30.3 cents to 9.6 cents, and the net ton-mile saving was 11.7 cents. The gross annual saving in the county for hauling charges has been approximately $50,000 since the roads were improved.

In Dallas County, Ala., $366,977 secured from the bond issue was used to improve 101 miles of road. Average loads increased from 1,500 pounds to 2,500 pounds, and ton-mile hauling costs fell from 30 to 15 cents. The net ton-mile saving was 10.9 cents. It is estimated that the county saves annually $90,000 gross in hauling costs as a result of the road improvement.

In Lauderdale County, Miss., $500,000 worth of bonds was issued and 96 miles of road improved. Average loads increased from 1,500 to 2,500 pounds, and hauling costs dropped from 37 to 20 cents per ton-mile. This brought about a net saving of 3.9 cents per ton-mile when all annual charges against the road improvements were considered. The annual gross saving to the county is approximately $43,400.

In Manatee County, Fla., $252,500 obtained from a bond issue improved 63 miles of road. Average loads increased from 1,500 pounds to 4,800 pounds, which resulted in a reduction of ton-mile hauling costs from 45 to 20 cents. The net saving per ton-mile since the roads have been improved is 12½ cents. It is estimated that the county saves annually in gross hauling costs $32,573.

In Wise County, Va., $1,031,578.54 was provided for road work by bond issues, State contributions, and in other ways. From this fund 83 miles of road have been surfaced and 66 miles graded. Average loads have increased from 1,500 to 2,500 pounds and ton-mile hauling costs have been reduced from 57 to 23 cents. The gross saving to the county, when hauling costs alone are considered, is approximately $68,000 a year.

Mr. Chairman, I have some additional information in reference to another paragraph in the bill that I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the following item in the bill—

RENT IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Rent of buildings, Department of Agriculture: For rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia, for use of the various bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Department of Agriculture, $143,689—

I desire to submit the following letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, with data accompanying.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CANDLER: With reference to the space rented by the Department of Agriculture in the District of Columbia and the proposed increase in the appropriation for rents, I inclose a complete statement showing the present situation in detail (Exhibit A). This statement differs from that printed in the Book of Estimates for the reason that since the statement for the estimates was prepared the department has rented a fireproof storage warehouse at No. 220 Linworth Place SW., for which it pays an annual rental of $3,750 (0.237 cent per square foot gross), and 12,410 square feet in the Munsey Building at an annual rental of $14,000 ($1.12 per square foot gross). These additions raise the average rental per square foot paid by this department from 0.278 cent per square foot gross, as stated in the Book of Estimates, to 0.30 cent per square foot gross. We are renting a total of 499,605 square feet gross, the total rental being at the rate of $150,208. Of this sum $11,790 is paid from the permanent annual appropriations for "meat inspection" and $15,000 from the appropriations for "cotton standards," "grain standards," and "warehouse act," each of which carries the specific authority to pay rent in the District of Columbia. The entire sum of $150,208 will not be paid for rent during the present fiscal year, for the reason that the lease on the quarters in the Munsey Building did not begin until October 17, 1916, and the lease on the storage warehouse at 220 Linworth Place did not begin until November 1, 1916.

I inclose also a statement (Exhibit B) from the Book of Estimates showing the rental paid by other branches of the Government. These figures are assumed to be gross and the average per square foot has been figured in each case for comparison with the Department of Agriculture statement on this basis. You will notice that our rate per square foot gross is slightly lower than the rates paid by the branches included in the statement.

I inclose also a statement (Exhibit C) made before the House Committee on Agriculture by Mr. Charles J. Brand, Chief, Office of Markets and Rural Organization, of the rentals that bureau has had to pay for offices in various cities. The average price per square foot is $1.11 and the highest rate paid, namely, in Boston, Mass., is $2.22 per square foot. Granting that these prices include heat, light, and elevator service, it is certain that the average rate is much higher than the average rate the department is paying in Washington. These figures are given you for comparison with the rentals paid by the department in Washington.

With reference to the increase of $20,000 in the item, "Rent in the District of Columbia," included in the Agricultural appropriation bill as reported to the House, it has long been the desire of the department to bring the Forest Service into a building nearer to the Secretary's office—a building which would be fireproof and large enough to permit of necessary expansion. In common with other branches of the department, the Forest Service has grown and is now overcrowded in its present quarters. With the rental ($18,000) now paid by the Forest Service, however, it is not possible to secure the erection of a building for the Forest Service alone, since the builders do not care to go into a proposition of that size, nor does the department think it desirable to secure the erection of a building which will accommodate the Forest Service alone, when, by combining the Forest Service rental with other funds, it believes it can secure the erection of a large building which will accommodate under one roof the Forest Service and other branches which are needing room for expansion as much or more. Should the increase be allowed, therefore, it is the department's intention to take the $18,000 now paid for the Forest Service rental, plus the $20,000 increase, and a fair portion, perhaps $10,000, of the rental now paid by the Office of Markets, in the Munsey Building, and secure the erection of a large modern fireproof office building in the immediate vicinity of the department, placing therein not only the Forest Service but certain units of other bureaus. This is intended to release space which will enable the Office of Markets to expand in the building it now occupies (1358 B Street, SW.), and remove from the Munsey Building the office for which it is now paying the high rental of $1.12 per square foot. From past experience and from present tentative offers, the department believes it can secure the erection of such a building at a rate per square foot of rental which, even allowing for the furnishing of light, heat, and elevator service by the department, will be less than half the price exacted by the owners of office buildings uptown in Washington.

If the increase of $20,000 in the rental appropriation is granted, therefore, the department intends to make every effort to secure a building of considerable size. If it can secure a new, modern, fireproof office building providing, say, 100,000 square feet of floor space, this will not exceed our immediate present needs. The Office of Markets, with the cotton standards, grain standards, and warehouse legislation to execute and no quarters for the additional employees needed, has been forced to rent high-priced offices in the Munsey Building away from the bureau headquarters; the Forest Service is seriously hampered for space; certain units of the States Relations Service are crowded to a point where efficient work is almost impossible; and the Bureau of Chemistry, the Bureau of Biological Survey, the Federal Horticultural Board, and other branches of the Department are in urgent need of more room. The department feels very strongly that its plea for immediate relief, represented by the $20,000 increase proposed in the rent fund, is thoroughly justified by actual present conditions, and that it can not properly execute the tasks laid upon it by Congress without such relief.

In conclusion, I wish to lay before you a few figures to indicate something of the growth of the Department of Agriculture in recent years. The new buildings known as laboratories A and B were authorized in 1903, and for that fiscal year the total appropriations to the department were $5,015,846. The buildings were completed and occupied in March, 1908. For that fiscal year the total appropriations were $13,037,802, of which $12,595,502 was actually disbursed. The department had outgrown the new buildings before they were completed. Since 1908 the growth has continued, and for the fiscal year 1917 the total appropriations are $36,128,852, or nearly three times the disbursements in 1908. The disbursements for rent in 1908 were $65,705, and for 1917 will be about $142,000, or about two and one-quarter times what they were in 1908. The appropriation for rent has therefore not kept pace with the growth of the department, and the result is a serious overcrowding in many bureaus.

Very truly, yours, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

The space occupied at Cairo, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., is in Federal buildings, and no rental is paid.

The Clerk read as follows:

For conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction and maintenance, and investigations concerning various road materials and preparations; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the preparation and application of bituminous and other binders; for the purchase of materials and equipment; for the employment of assistants and labor; for the erection of buildings; such experimental work to be confined as nearly as possible to one point during the fiscal year, $60,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is the gentleman able to tell us where the Government built roads last year out of these appropriations?

Mr. LEVER. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I can not.

Mr. MANN. And, further, can the gentleman tell how the pull is exercised to get a road built in a community at the expense of the Government?

Mr. LEVER. I can not give the gentleman the information. I have no such roads in my district.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly the gentleman from South Carolina would be able to get one in his district, and he is to be complimented that he has not exercised his pull. I notice there are a good many of these Government-built roads or sections of road around Washington. I suppose that possibly some Government official has a summer home some place around Washington and gets the good-road division to build a good road at Government expense, experimentally, so as to accommodate the Government official who has a summer home there.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, we made no inquiry as to that particular matter this year, but last year we did make some inquiry, and my recollection of the general statement made to us is that the department had, as a matter of fact, built many of its roads around Washington here, because they were near the office, and furnished a field laboratory for their experimental and investigational work.

Mr. MANN. Where the character of traffic is probably different from that in any other place in the United States, and where the knowledge acquired would be of no use at all in nine-tenths of the United States. Of course they have automobiles going over the roads here, and that is what they were built for here. I suppose there are not very many farmers' wagons going over these roads with heavy loads. There is not anything of that sort to speak of around Washington, and the road that does bring the people in has not been taken care of by the roads division. Out here at Bradley Lane, or some place like that, where a farmer's wagon probably never was seen, the Government builds a road.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman understands, of course, that the department is conducting experiments in the field with ordinary types of road that are intended for ordinary traffic. I have been over only one or two of these experimental roads around Washington. One road goes through the Arlington farm in the direction of Alexandria and one in the direction of Gettysburg.

Mr. MANN. There is one down in the district of our genial friend from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

Mr. CARLIN. And it is a very good road, too.

Mr. MANN. And there is one out to the Chevy Chase Club. There are several of them around here—I think a grossly improper expenditure of public money by the Government.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that I think the department has concentrated its work in the study of road binders and concrete roads and things of that kind—not the ordinary country roads—around Washington, for the reason that it furnishes their force of experts a field laboratory close at hand.

Mr. MANN. Have they ever made any report in reference to the various sections of the Chevy Chase road?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; we have put those gentlemen under examination before our committee hour after hour, and have tried to find out what they were doing.

Mr. MANN. What can the gentleman tell about the different kinds of road building?

Mr. LEVER. I do not try to keep such details in mind.

Mr. MANN. Have they ever made any report to anybody else on the subject?

Mr. LEVER. There are a great many bulletins that the Office of Roads has issued. I do not know that they have ever made any report about the Chevy Chase road.

Mr. MANN. There was a time when I used to make points of order on a lot of these items which are subject to a point of order, and I did it just because this money is being spent very largely to accommodate gentlemen around Washington at the Government expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the erection and equipment of a laboratory building on the Arlington Farm property of the United States Department of Agriculture for permanent quarters for the testing and research work of the Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering, plans and specifications to be prepared and work done under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, $75,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I want to know what the purpose of this is, and the object to be attained by the appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. The Office of Public Roads is now doing practically all of its laboratory and testing work in the Willard Building, across from the Willard Hotel. It is using both the garret and the cellar of the building. The chief of the Office of Roads informs the committee that their quarters are greatly cramped, that the fumes from acids used in testing road material is, to say the least, disagreeable, if not unhealthful to the employees; and while it is true that they have a temporary structure over on the farm at Arlington, that that structure is by no means adequate to handle the business in the way of testing materials that will come in by reason of the passage of the Federal road act, which was likely to swamp this bureau with all kinds of road material for testing out.

Mr. COX. This is a new provision, is it not?

Mr. LEVER. It is a new provision.

Mr. COX. How large a plant have they?

Mr. LEVER. It is a comparatively small plant, and temporary.

Mr. COX. How long have they been operating it?

Mr. LEVER. Several years.

Mr. COX. What kind of a building do they propose to erect.

Mr. LEVER. A building that will be suitable for laboratory purposes.

Mr. COX. Down in the bottom or up on the hill?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know.

Mr. COX. I do not know whether this is needed or not.

Mr. LEVER. This was recommended several years ago. It has been needed for some time and now it seems to me that it is really an emergency proposition, in view of the fact that the testing work is going to be very large by virtue of the good roads law.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Chairman, I may be doing wrong, but I think I shall withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF MARKETS.

Salaries, Bureau of Markets: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 administrative assistant, $2,500; 1 administrative assistant, $1,980; 5 clerks, class 4; 10 clerks, class 3; 15 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,380; 1 clerk, $1,320; 29 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,140; 2 clerks, at $1,100 each; 30 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 clerks, at $1,080 each; 2 clerks, at $1,020 each; 20 clerks, at $900 each; 3 clerks, at $840 each; 2 clerks, at $720 each; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,800; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,380; 1 laboratory helper, $900; 3 laboratory aids, at $900 each; 1 laboratory aid, $840; 7 laboratory aids, at $720 each; 2 laboratory aids, at $600 each; 1 photographer, $1,400; 1 photographer, $1,200; 1 supervising telegrapher, $1,620; 1 telegraph operator, $1,400; 2 telegraph operators, at $1,200 each; 1 telephone operator, $600; 1 draftsman, $900; 1 map tracer, $900; 1 map tracer, $720; 1 map tracer, $600; 1 map tracer, $480; 2 skilled laborers, at $900 each; 1 laborer, $720; 2 laborers, at $660 each; 4 messenger boys or laborers, at $600 each; 4 messenger boys or laborers, at $540 each; 10 messenger boys or laborers, at $480 each; 2 messenger boys, at $420 each; 1 messenger boy, $360; 1 charwoman, $540; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $300; 2 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $198,320.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the figures "$5,000," page 73, line 16.

Mr. LEVER. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What is the reason for the change of the name?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the Office of Markets and Rural Organization was created some three or four years ago, and it has grown very rapidly in its work. Candidly, the name of the Office of Markets and Rural Organization never did set very well with me personally. It is a long, bungling name and does not indicate very clearly the line of work of that service. The country has come to look upon the Office of Markets and Rural Organization as a Bureau of Markets, and probably three-quarters of the mail addressed to the service by the ordinary individual is by the title of Bureau of Markets; and we felt that it simplified the situation and shortened the name and dignified the office somewhat.

Mr. MANN. Not having been raised in a country where they have monarchs and where they name the princesses by all the names they can find by historical reference, I never have believed in very long names. I think the change is a very good one, but why not also, then, have changed the name of the Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering. When a man comes to write a letter to one of these bureaus he can not get the name on one line on the envelope.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's criticism is entirely good, and I think we can take care of that at some future time. The gentleman understands why the Office of Roads was changed. It was done when we reorganized the department, when certain additional lines were put into that bureau.

Mr. MANN. It would have been easy to have said the Bureau of Roads and Engineering.

Mr. LEVER. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this taking of a long name is all right for reform organizations. They want a name as long as possible because they think it looks well coming after their name; they want to make it as long as they can, but when it comes to practical work every name ought to be as short as possible, especially Government names.

Mr. COX. I want to ask the chairman of the committee for information on this gentleman here, "one administrative assistant." Is that a new place?

Mr. LEVER. No; it is not.

Mr. COX. I only make the point of order on the figures "5,000" in line 16.

Mr. LEVER. That is subject to a point of order, and I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 73, line 16, at the beginning of the line in lieu of the figures "5,000" stricken out, insert "4,500."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Bureau of Markets has more than justified the expectation of its best friends. I do not claim that I was one of them. It was suggested in Congress for a number of years that we pass a law creating a division or bureau of markets, specifying what its jurisdiction should be, and sticking in a lot of things about which none of us knew much. But instead of doing that, in an Agricultural appropriation bill several years ago there was placed a modest appropriation justifying the creation, at least temporarily, of the office which might give some information concerning markets and marketing, and work out some kind of a problem or theory. I think they have done exceedingly good work from what I have heard and read coming from that division, and probably in much better shape, under the provisions of the annual appropriation bill which is subject to some extension, than would have been the case if they had tried to define and limit its authority and jurisdiction by the passage of legislation as was originally proposed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I know of no service in the Government where the increase in the appropriation has been so large as in this item. Last year the appropriation for this item carried $129,000, and this year $198,000, an increase of $69,000. I wish to inquire whether that is merely due to the transfer of clerks from a lump-sum appropriation or due to an increase in the number of clerks?

Mr. LEVER. There are really only three new places in the bureau. One is a draftsman at $900, one a skilled laborer at $900, and one a charwoman. The others are all transfers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the eulogium which has been passed on this bureau by the distinguished leader of the minority.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The reason why this splendid work has been done is because of the most excellent chief of the bureau, one of the brightest and most energetic men in the whole department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, I take it, he comes from the gentleman's district?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. No; he does not. The increase to which the gentleman has referred, I am sure, will be used by this splendid officer of the Government to bring about the very best results for all the people.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, since the convening of Congress, with other Members of the House, I have received Bulletin 401, issued by this Bureau of Markets, concerning the distribution of muskmelons in 1915. It contains a number of printed charts, some 10 or 12, containing the prices of muskmelons at 100 or 200 different places throughout the country. I can not see how these multitudinous charts containing statistics, showing the price of muskmelons throughout the country, can be of any value to farmers, dealers, or anyone else in general. The one I have in my hand is but a sample, there being 12 of the same kind. I think it is not only a waste of activity, but a waste of money.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I can say to the gentleman that I can fill the RECORD absolutely from cover to cover if necessary for next week with letters and resolutions of commendation from the different business men in that very section, saying that this market-news service has been of immense value.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this does not refer to a particular section, but refers to the entire country.

Mr. LEVER. In the marketing of muskmelons. It is the Oregon melon that I have in mind. I might fill the RECORD with letters from the apple and strawberry growers and from the onion growers and others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19359, the Agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MAPES was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of H. R. 17962, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is on the Speaker's desk a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 190) from the Senate, which came over this morning, respecting the continuation of the joint committee to consider railroad legislation, and there is a similar House resolution reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the calendar of the House, which I have authority to call up. I ask the Speaker to lay that resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays the Senate resolution before the House.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know enough about the rules of the House to know just when I ought to raise the question of consideration. Should it be raised before this resolution is laid before the House?

Mr. MANN. The question of consideration is raised when the bill is read the first time.

Mr. RAYBURN. I make that as a parliamentary inquiry. In other words, I want to make the point of order against the consideration of the resolution. I want to know when is the proper time for me to make it?

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman raise?

Mr. RAYBURN. I make the point of order that this is not a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is on the Union Calendar, is it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think the gentleman's point of order is well taken.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will hear me a moment——

The SPEAKER. Let us get this straight before we start. This resolution is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Senate joint resolution is not on the Union Calendar. It is on the Speaker's desk, and would not get to the Union Calendar, because it makes no charge on the Treasury at all.

Mr. RAYBURN. The House resolution is the one that controls.

Mr. ADAMSON. The House resolution would probably be so considered; but the committee abandoned that and reported as a substitute the Senate resolution itself verbatim, and inasmuch as the resolution contains no charge on the Treasury it ought not to be on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have never understood how you could carry on an investigation without a charge on the Treasury.

Mr. ADAMSON. Because the law we passed carried the appropriation, and this new resolution does not provide for an additional expense at all. It merely provides for an extension of the time in which the committee shall report.

The SPEAKER. There is no question in the mind of the Chair but that the resolution is out of order, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. ADAMSON. If it is impossible to consider it under the rules of the House, I hope it will be referred to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, so that it may be reported back.

The SPEAKER. All right.

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a Senate joint resolution, which the Clerk will please read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution in the class other than Members of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the high cost of living.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the high cost of living. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MANN. Not on Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Black John Slough, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 1885); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Belfast Harbor, Me. (H. Doc. No. 1886); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a statement of the names of all persons employed in the Bureau of Animal Industry, except those whose salaries were paid from the meat-inspection appropriation, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 1887); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18551) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Montgomery, in the State of Tennessee, to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1255), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18550) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Montgomery, in the State of Tennessee, to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1256), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DECKER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18534) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the St. Francis River, at or near Parkin, Ark., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report

(No. 1257), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DEWALT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19296) authorizing the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railway Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the borough of Warren and township of Pleasant, Warren County, Pa., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1258), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19297) authorizing the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railway Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River in Glade and Kinzua Townships, Warren County, Pa., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1259), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CAREW, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19298) authorizing the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railway Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the town of Allegany, County of Cattaraugus, N. Y., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1260), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RAYBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18529) granting the consent of Congress to the police jury of Rapides Parish, La., to construct a bridge across Red River at or near Boyce, La., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1261), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18725) granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Kratka Township, Pennington County, Minn., to construct a bridge across Red Lake River, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1262), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18720) permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at Bemidji, in the State of Minnesota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1263), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DECKER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18815) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a road across the St. Francis River at or near intersections of sections 13, 14, 23, and 24, township 15 north, range 6 east, in Craighead County, Ark., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1264), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DEWALT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19000) authorizing the Delaware Railroad Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nanticoke River at Seaford, Sussex County, Del., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1265), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 8, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast brought us into such close relationship with each other in this life that we can not bear our burdens alone. Thou hast taught us to bear one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ. We pray that we may so live that we shall add nothing to the burdens of anyone who must help us bear ours, that we may help them by lives that are righteous, upright, and just. Grant that we many make the world's burdens lighter by our lives being clean before God and useful in the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

ALBERT B. FALL, a Senator from the State of New Mexico, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

Mr. LODGE. I present certain resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held at Faneuil Hall, Boston, December 9, 1916. The resolutions are very brief, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD. They relate to the cost of living.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., January 5, 1917.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: At a mass meeting of the people of Boston, held in Faneuil Hall Saturday, December 9, 1916, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas conditions have developed in Boston and throughout the United States which have caused and are causing the people of the country great suffering from exorbitant prices, and which conditions threaten to develop disastrous results to the Nation if allowed to continue; and

"Whereas it is the consensus of opinion of the persons assembled at this meeting that these conditions have been brought about largely by speculation in foodstuffs resulting from opportunities offered for speculation through the increased demands due to the European war, as well as the shortage of some of the principal crops; and

"Whereas it is deemed necessary under such conditions to conserve in every possible manner the foodstuffs in this country to first meet public requirements; and

"Whereas it is inevitable that unless some relief is afforded by the proper authorities of the Government the constantly increasing prices will become prohibitive for the great masses of the people, which will be detrimental to the best interests and future development of this country, besides creating appalling want and privation to thousands of families: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we demand that the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the United States place upon the distribution of foodstuffs in this country such conditions and regulations as will prevent the restriction of production and distribution by trusts and monopolies, and insure to the people of this country sufficient foods to meet domestic requirements and living prices; and be it further

"Resolved, That we call upon the legislative and judicial branches of the Government of the United States at once to enact and enforce such laws as are necessary to protect the people of the United States against the greed, avarice, and insatiable desire of speculators for great gains and profits in the necessities of life to the detriment of the comfort and the health and the morals of the people of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to the Senators and the Representatives, and the United States district attorney; and that a consumers' committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to keep in touch with the proper authorities and urge prompt action in enacting new laws and in the enforcement of the present laws affecting these conditions; and that the people of Boston keep public opinion centered on high-price evils until relief is given."

Very respectfully, yours,

BERT FORD, Secretary,
80 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

Mr. KERN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Richmond, Ind., praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Evansville and of the Brotherhood of Bookbinders of Evansville, in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit the joint resolution to be read?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 177) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President without the intervention of the Electoral College, establishing their term of office at six years from the third Tuesday of January following their election, and fixing the time when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following be proposed as an amendment to the first three paragraphs of section 1, Article II, and to Article XII, and the second paragraph of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

Amend the first, second, and third paragraphs of section 1 of Article II and Article XII of the Constitution of the United States by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office shall be six years, beginning on the third Tuesday of January after his election, and no person who shall be elected to the office of President, after the ratification of this amendment, shall be eligible to hold the office by election. The President, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows:

"There shall be submitted to the qualified voters of each State having the qualifications requisite for the voters of the most numerous branch of the State legislature or for the voters for electors for President and Vice President, the election of a President and Vice President of the United States. The proper State officers shall make a list of all persons voted for as President and Vice President and of the number of votes cast in such State for each, which list they shall sign, certify, and transmit to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The candidate receiving the highest number of votes in each State for each office shall be entitled to receive the electoral vote of such State for such office, which electoral vote shall be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress of the United States. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes for President and Vice President to which each State is entitled, called electoral votes, shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the votes entitled to be cast by the States; and if no person shall have such majority, then from the persons having the highest number, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the third Tuesday of January next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of electoral votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of the votes of the States, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States."

Amend the second paragraph of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States by substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Tuesday in January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day, and the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence on the first Tuesday in January following their election. The terms of the officers mentioned in this resolution who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment are hereby changed to conform herewith, but each of said officers shall be entitled to the salary for the term for which he shall have been elected."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, upon the convening of the present session of Congress I introduced Senate joint resolution 177, proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of President and Vice President by the electoral vote of the State without the intervention of the Electoral College; establishing their term of office at six years from the third Tuesday of January following their election; fixing the first Tuesday of January following their election as the time when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin, and designating the first Tuesday of January each year as the date for the convening of Congress.

THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE SHOULD BE ABOLISHED.

The Electoral College at the time of the formation of our Government was deemed a wise means of electing the President and Vice President, as it was expected the members would exercise their best judgment in selecting such officers. Washington hoped political parties would never come into existence. However, they soon developed, and after they made nominations for those offices presidential electors exercised no judgment of their own as to the candidates, but, with only one exception, cast their votes for the party nominees. The purpose of the Electoral College having thus been voided, the machinery by which the electoral vote was cast became not only cumbersome but dangerous. Notwithstanding full explanations have repeatedly been made, many voters when they go to the polls expect to vote directly for President and Vice President, and consequently the list on the ballots of different groups of men as electors for such officers is confusing to them. The result is that some presidential electors receive more votes than their party associates, and the effect sometimes is to split the vote of a State in the electoral college. Four years ago the vote of California was so divided, as was also the vote of West Virginia in the recent election. Since the election of 1872, 11 other States have split their vote under this system. Such results are subversive of the true intent of the voters of those States.

There is always a possibility, though not a probability, of an elector casting his vote against the party nominees. Mr. Dougherty, in his work on The Electoral System of the United States, says, at page 253:

Nevertheless there is the ever-present possibility of a breach of trust. Treason may seem a remote contingency, yet in a time of great temptation there might come an electoral Benedict Arnold. It is in the face of all logic and experience to infer that because no traitor has yet been discovered a temptation of such peculiar subtlety will forever remain without a victim. * * *

The elector in the constitutional sense is an abortive organism. He has no function to fulfill. But he is not merely functionless, he is dangerous. It is as true in the moral as it is in the material realm that any mechanism or organ that has ceased to perform its function is sure to work mischief, if not positive detriment.

As certain qualifications are prescribed for presidential electors, there is also a chance that one elected may not be eligible for the position. While, happily, so far there has not been an overturning of the will of the people by reason of the operation of those laws, yet in a close election such result might happen with disastrous consequences.

The constitutional amendment proposed provides that the candidates for President and Vice President shall be directly voted for by the qualified citizens of each State, and that whoever receives the highest number of votes in a State for such offices shall be entitled to the electoral vote of such State, which electoral vote shall be equal to one vote for each Senator and Representative of that State, as now provided by the Constitution. In other words, the electoral representation is preserved but the dangerous machinery abolished.

Some believe that the President should be elected by a majority of the total vote of the Republic, but a moment's reflection will show the impracticability of such a procedure. Colorado has woman suffrage. Connecticut has not. Although those States have practically equal population, the vote of Colorado is twice as large as the vote of Connecticut. Connecticut would never agree that the big vote of Colorado should be counted as part of the total vote of the Republic when her vote is only half as large. Hence it would be impossible for such an amendment to receive the approval of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to his colleague?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not my colleague think that Connecticut could very easily remedy that discrepancy by granting suffrage to women?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; and it should do so; but the question is, Will it do so? Some States of the Republic will not, and for that reason it would be futile to attempt to present a constitutional amendment providing that the President and Vice President shall be elected by a majority of the popular vote when there is such a difference in the qualifications of voters in the several States. I would not hope to gain even a favorable report upon a matter of that kind, mixing with it another question.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I should like to ask if the qualifications of all the voters in Colorado are not the same?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly, they are.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Then, wherein would there be reasonable objection to having the President elected by a majority vote?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the entire Republic, does the Senator mean?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. In any State in the Union if the people were in favor of a majority vote electing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am in favor of a majority vote in each State determining how the electoral vote of that State shall be cast; but on the question of a popular vote in the Republic, counting the vote in the aggregate of all the States, it would be futile to hope that such a constitutional amendment would ever receive the approval of three-fourths of the legislatures of the States. For that reason it would be simply waste paper to introduce a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment of that kind; but if we preserve the electoral vote as it now exists, and as it was agreed upon at the time of the formation of the Constitution, without the Electoral College, I have hopes that the complicated and dangerous machinery now employed in the selection of an Electoral College will be abolished, and that is my purpose in introducing this joint resolution.

The determination as to the electoral vote each State should have was the result of a compromise between the small and the large States, and it is not likely that the small States would ever consent to changing their relative power in the election of a President and Vice President.

Popular elections for the electoral vote by congressional districts and two at large for each State is subject to the serious objection that each State would gerrymander the districts to give political advantage, and thus destroy the will of the people of that State. It would also multiply the possibility of disputes over the election and returns by making the returns so numerous.

SIX-YEAR TERM FOR PRESIDENT WITH INELIGIBILITY TO REELECTION.

The term of the President and Vice President, in my judgment, should be six years. No policy of a President can be put into effect and tested in a shorter period of time than six years. To have a campaign waged upon the policies of an administration before the laws enacted therein have been given a reasonable time in which to demonstrate their benefits is not fair. It takes time to enact measures and it takes a longer time to test their value.

The President after six years of service should be ineligible to reelection. There is always a temptation to use the 480,327 employees of the Government in the interest of reelection, and in the hands of some candidate that power might be used to the subversion of the will of the people. A President is subject in many instances to the same influences as other men. While in office, and a candidate for reelection, his action might sometimes be influenced by the threat or offer of support of particular classes of people. Organized opposition of even small bodies of voters is often sufficient in close States to defeat a candidate. The office should be made free from such influence. Reelections to the position of chief executive of a nation has often been the means by which usurpation has been consummated and the overthrow of Republics accomplished. We should never forget that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before the Senator passes from the portion of his address devoted to the six-year term—a suggestion with which I may say to the Senator I entirely agree; I believe that it would be a wise change to make; and I also agree with the Senator that it would be wise to provide for a single term—I desire to ask him this question: The platform adopted by the Senator's party in 1912 at Baltimore contained a plank declaring in favor of a single term for the President and pledging the nominee of that convention to that principle. The platform adopted at St. Louis in 1916, as I recall, omitted that principle. Can the Senator tell us whether the Democratic Party has changed its mind in reference to that question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the platform of 1912 was not exactly as the Senator has stated it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is exactly as the Senator has stated, except that the Senator has omitted one element.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The provision which is contained in the platform of 1912 reads as follows:

> We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The principle of what? The principle of the single term?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The principle of adopting a constitutional amendment providing for the ineligibility of a President to be again a candidate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no, Mr. President; that will not do. The adoption of a constitutional amendment is not a principle.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is the principle——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The principle, if the Senator will permit me to finish my suggestion, is the single term; and the platform of the Senator's party pledges the candidate to the principle of a single term.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, the pledge which is made here is that there should be a constitutional amendment embodying that principle. Now, I want to say with relation to that——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator there, then, why, his party being in control of both Houses of Congress for the past four years, some attempt has really not been made to carry out that pledge of the Democratic platform?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, we enacted some 20 or 25 pledges; but we can not carry everything into effect. I am trying to have one carried into effect here now, and I hope to have the cooperation of the Senator. Did the Senator introduce any measure looking to a constitutional amendment providing that the President shall be ineligible for reelection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; because it was not necessary. Some other Senator introduced such a measure, and it was reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary. It was debated upon the floor of the Senate, and the Senator from Utah announced himself as being in favor of it; but for some mysterious reason the whole matter was abandoned, and I wish the Senator would enlighten us as to why that was done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are hundreds of measures that are abandoned because they have to be abandoned. I have had a bill up here to give civil government to Porto Rico, and I have been for six months trying to get a hearing upon it, but it has been impossible to do so. I have asked unanimous consent several times for its consideration, and I have moved its consideration several times. It is an important measure, involving the liberties and rights of the people of Porto Rico, but I can not get consideration of it.

Now, I want to say further that, while the Senator no doubt is directing his criticism to the action of the President, the situation was such, as it developed, that President Wilson could not have declined with fairness to his party a renomination for that office. Under the conditions which arose by reason of his being in the office during the critical stages of negotiations existing between this country and foreign Governments it would have been absolutely a desertion of the Democratic Party if he had refused to be a candidate for the office of President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The President, however, in line with the declaration of his platform which pledged him to the principle of a single term, might very well have suggested to his party in Congress the advisability of adopting a constitutional amendment carrying the principle into effect.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, you can conceive of things that ought to be said or ought to be done by every Senator here, and sometimes we say them and sometimes we do not; sometimes we do not get the chance to say them at an opportune time, and for that reason it seems to me the criticism of the Senator is not well founded.

THE NEW CONGRESS SHOULD COUNT AND DECLARE THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The President and Vice President should enter upon the performance of their duties as soon as the new Congress can count the electoral votes, just as the newly elected governors of our States are inducted into office as soon as the new legislatures of the States canvass the votes and declare them elected. That is the reason why Congress should convene two weeks before the inauguration. The shorter the time between the convening of Congress and the inauguration of the President the less danger there is of complications arising from death of the candidate. In many States the legislature convenes only one week before the inauguration of the governor.

At present the old Congress counts the electoral votes. After a very close election which changes the political complexion of an administration it is dangerous to permit the defeated party to retain control of the machinery by which such important officers are declared elected.

Under our Constitution, upon the failure of any candidate to receive a majority of the electoral votes, it devolves upon the House of Representatives to elect, the representation from each State having one vote. This at present is done not by the new Congress but by the old one. Thereby it is possible for a political party repudiated by the people to elect a President. This is a clear violation of the principle of representative government. Had the present election of President, by any of the contingencies provided, been thrown into the House of Representatives, Mr. Hughes would have been elected. It is not difficult to conceive of a condition arising under the present system, by which injustice might be done that would produce a revolution. Why take the chances of a conflict that may rock the very foundation of our Government when the evil can be easily remedied?

The Constitution further provides: "If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of death or other constitutional disability of the President." What a temptation for delay and for the defeat of the true choice of the people! Now is the time, before the contingencies arise, to remedy the defect.

The fact that the weather of January would be inclement for an inaugural parade is too insignificant a reason to prevent the adoption of a constitutional amendment which promises so much for good government. Why should we have in a Republic the great pomp and ceremony which usually attend the coronation of monarchs? If we must have them, why can not they be in the nature of celebrations at some seasonable time?

CONGRESS SHOULD CONVENE ON THE FIRST TUESDAY OF JANUARY FOLLOWING THE ELECTION.

Mr. President, under the present system Congress is elected on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November of the even years and does not convene in regular session until the first Monday of December of the year following. What a travesty upon representative government is the meeting of Congress 13 months after its election! What a delusion is the statement that Representatives come fresh from the people! What an opportunity is afforded to forget the pledges made at the election! It is true an extraordinary session may be called early, but such sessions are limited generally to one subject, which of necessity makes enormous waste of the time of each House in waiting for the other to consider and pass the measure. It is essential to good government that the expressed will of the people be crystallized into law at the earliest practical moment. Senators and Representatives in the campaign, having discussed the issues with all their ability, are better equipped then to enact into law the desired legislation than after a long delay.

The meeting of Congress 13 months after the election produces most inequitable results in contested-election cases. The term of a Representative is nearly half served before the committee can enter upon the consideration of his case, and it is not brought to a vote in the House until 15 to 24 months after the commencement of the term. The Government, in the meantime, pays the salary to the one who serves and also to the contestant should he be seated. During all that time the congressional district, at least politically, is misrepresented.

The time for the convening of Congress on the first Monday in December is very inopportune. An adjournment of 10 days or two weeks for the Christmas holidays is always taken and many Members go to their homes, returning late. No real work is done until January.

Heretofore it has been deemed inexpedient to prescribe that Congress shall convene in January following the election, because Senators were not elected by the legislatures until the middle of January, and sometimes not until February and March. The warm season being near would make it undesirable for the holding of a long session of Congress for the consideration of general legislation, but since Senators are now elected by the people at the general November election it becomes very proper for Congress to convene in January.

ABOLISH THE SHORT SESSION.

Mr. President, the terms of office of Senators and Representatives expire on the 3d day of March, and now the second regular session is held during the three months immediately preceding. This second regular session, called the short session, is held after the election of the new Congress, when many Members of this short session have been defeated by the people. To permit such Senators and Representatives, after they have failed of election, still to represent their constituents is contrary to every principle of our Government.

Often there is a complete political change of administration, but under the present system we have the representatives of the old political party for three months after defeat passing laws directly in conflict with the last expressed will of the people. Not even the legislative bodies of monarchies are permitted so to misrepresent their constituents. An examination of the Statutes at Large will disclose that outside of the general appropriation and private pension bills three-fourths of the legislation of a Congress is enacted during the second regular session. Such legislation so hastily enacted must be illy considered and some of it detrimental.

The record of each Senator and Representative should be completed before he comes before his constituents for indorsement. After he has been retired by the people he is not in a fit frame of mind to legislate in their behalf. If he is open to the temptation of an improper offer, then is the time it is suggested. Even those who are not subject to temptation often lose interest in legislation after failure of election. It is well known that defeated Members, during the closing session, often absent themselves for weeks and sometimes months.

A session should not be held which is brought to a close by constitutional limitation. Measures in behalf of the people are often defeated thereby. By postponing consideration to the expiring days of the limited session such a congestion of bills is accumulated as often precludes the enactment of measures most intimately connected with the welfare of the people.

This is one of the most important reforms needed in our Government, because it relates to the procedure by which all reforms can be enacted.

Mr. President, true representative government requires that citizens of a State should vote directly for President and Vice President; that the Electoral College should be abolished; that Congress should convene soon after the election thereof; that the electoral votes for President and Vice President should be counted and declared by the new Congress; and that the President should begin the work of his administration without hindrance or delay.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill 408, to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Page	Sutherland
Beckham	Hughes	Penrose	Swanson
Brandegee	James	Pittman	Thomas
Bryan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Thompson
Chamberlain	Jones	Saulsbury	Tillman
Chilton	Kenyon	Shafroth	Townsend
Clapp	Lodge	Sheppard	Walsh
Clark	McCumber	Sherman	Watson
Dillingham	McLean	Simmons	Williams
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Works
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Harding	Owen	Stone

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is temporarily absent on official business. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Senate on account of official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if it is in order—I am not sure—and the Senator from Montana will yield for the request I desire to make, I should like to introduce a joint resolution pending the motion of the Senator from Montana, and I ask for immediate action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield for that purpose?

Mr. WALSH. I did not understand the nature of the joint resolution.

Mr. STONE. I will ask to have the joint resolution read. It is very short.

Mr. GALLINGER. I reserve the right to object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the title of the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur March 1, 1917, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I will withdraw the joint resolution for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Montana that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 408, to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the motion be laid on the table; and on that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will vote. I vote "nay." I desire this statement of my pair and its transfer to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). As the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has not voted, and as I have a general pair with him, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], but I understand that if he were present he would vote as I propose to vote, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "nay."

Mr. BRADY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "yea."

Mr. McLEAN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator. Not being able to get a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Brandegee	Gallinger	McLean	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones	Martine, N. J.	Sutherland
Clapp	Kenyon	Norris	Townsend
Clark	Kern	Page	Wadsworth
Cummins	Lane	Penrose	Watson
Curtis	Lippitt	Poindexter	Works
Dillingham	Lodge	Sherman
Fernald	McCumber	Smoot

NAYS—28.

Ashurst	Hughes	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	James	Saulsbury	Stone
Bryan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Shafroth	Swanson
Chilton	O'Gorman	Sheppard	Thomas
Fletcher	Overman	Shields	Thompson
Hardwick	Owen	Simmons	Walsh
Hitchcock	Pittman	Smith, Ga.	Williams

NOT VOTING—38.

Beckham	Gore	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Gronna	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Brady	Harding	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Broussard	Hollis	Nelson	Tillman
Catron	Husting	Newlands	Underwood
Colt	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Vardaman
Culberson	Kirby	Phelan	Warren
du Pont	La Follette	Pomerene	Weeks
Fall	Lea, Tenn.	Reed
Goff	Lee, Md.	Robinson

So Mr. WALSH'S motion was laid on the table.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I move to take up Senate bill 392, known as the volunteer officers' retired-list bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to say in reference to this bill that it was reported out of the Committee on Military Affairs by me nearly a year ago. It has been before the Senate during all of this season, and I feel that the Senate ought to take it up and dispose of it one way or the other.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the fact that the committee of conference on the part of the Senate upon the immigration bill is ready to report. I wish to submit the conference report and to ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will allow me, it will not take me two minutes to say what I will have to say, and his matter is privileged, I know.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I should like very much to hear what the Senator from Oregon wishes to say, but as this is not a debatable question I hope it will not lead to general debate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall not discuss it at length. If the Senator objects, all right.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall make a very brief statement.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be obliged to object to anyone explaining why this bill should be taken up unless I am permitted to explain why House bill 408 ought to be taken up.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator objects, all right.

Mr. WALSH. If the question is to be open for general discussion, I have no objection to the Senator proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable, and there seems to be objection. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. STONE. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Michigan is to take up Senate bill 392, commonly known as the Civil War volunteer officers' retired-list bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. TOWNSEND called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and for that reason I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I vote "yea."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement made previously, I vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). In the absence of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 29, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I submit the following report (No. 352) from the committee of conference on the immigration bill, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 10384, "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 6, 7, and 35.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 36, and 37, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert the following: "unless otherwise provided for by existing treaties persons who are natives of islands not possessed by the United States adjacent to the Continent of Asia, situate south of the twentieth parallel of latitude north, west of the one hundred and sixtieth meridian of longitude east from Greenwich, and north of the tenth parallel of latitude south, or who are natives of any country, province, or dependency situated on the Continent of Asia west of the one hundred and tenth meridian of longitude east from Greenwich and east of the fiftieth meridian of longitude east from Greenwich and south of the fiftieth parallel of latitude north, except that portion of said territory situate between the fiftieth and the sixty-fourth meridians of longitude east from Greenwich and the twenty-fourth and thirty-eighth parallels of latitude north, and no alien now in any way excluded from or prevented from entering the United States shall be admitted to the United States"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out insert the following:

"SEC. 11a. That the Secretary of Labor is hereby authorized and directed to enter into negotiations, through the Department of State, with countries vessels of which bring aliens to the United States, with a view to detailing inspectors and matrons of the United States Immigration Service for duty on vessels carrying immigrant or emigrant passengers between foreign ports and ports of the United States. When such inspectors and matrons are detailed for said duty they shall remain in that part of the vessel where immigrant passengers are carried; and it shall be their duty to observe such passengers during the voyage and report to the immigration authorities in charge at the port of landing any information of value in determining the admissibility of such passengers that may have become known to them during the voyage."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert the following:

"All aliens coming to the United States shall be required to state under oath the purposes for which they come, the length of time they intend to remain in the United States, whether or not they intend to abide in the United States permanently and become citizens thereof, and such other items of information regarding themselves as will aid the immigration officials in determining whether they belong to any of the excluded classes enumerated in section 3 hereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "taken up his permanent residence in this country"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert the following: "July 1, 1917"; and the Senate agree to the same.

E. D. SMITH,
THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN L. BURNETT,
E. A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My motion will not take a moment; it is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the consideration of the conference report lead to any debate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The conference report, of course, has the right to be received, but I suppose, except by unanimous consent, it can not be proceeded with to-day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That was my object in asking the Senator from South Carolina the question. I did not want to object to the consideration of the report if it was not going to lead to debate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not think it will lead to debate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a moment, a single objection will not carry the report over. The question of consideration can be raised and must be decided at once without debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The only point I desired to make was that the motion to proceed to the consideration of the report, if agreed to, would displace the bill that we have just agreed to consider.

Mr. LODGE. Not if it comes up by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the report comes up by unanimous consent and the bill is temporarily laid aside, with the agreement that we shall again take it up, that is a different proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that the motion shall be immediately put and shall be decided without debate. Those in favor of proceeding to the consideration of the conference report will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I call for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division is called for. The Chair is in doubt. Those in favor of proceeding to the consideration of the conference report will rise.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senate fully understands this matter. Of course, the question is not debatable, but I wish to say that I do not know of any ground upon which there can be any objection to the report. I do not think it will lead to any debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will ask unanimous consent to have the conference report taken up, I will ask to lay aside temporarily the bill now before the Senate, so that the conference report may be considered. I do not wish, however, a motion to prevail here which would displace the bill that we have just agreed to consider.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand as thoroughly as does the Senator that it is a privileged motion and that I can make it anyway, but I have no objection to asking for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

Mr. OWEN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire whether under the rule the conference report should not first be printed?

Mr. LODGE. No; that is the House rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that the rule seems to be imperative on the Chair to put the motion immediately and without debate. Rule XXVII provides as to the presentation of a conference report that—

> When received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put and shall be determined without debate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I withhold my vote because I am paired generally with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). The occupant of the chair makes the same announcement of his pair and its transfer as on the former vote and votes "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of the transfer of my pair which I made a moment ago, I vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). In the absence of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McLEAN. Transferring my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], I vote "nay."

Mr. BRADY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and therefore withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 31, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10384) to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to do what I rarely ever do in the Senate, and that is to make an explanation of why I voted against the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The bill which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has in charge has been before the Senate in one form or another for a good many years. It has been made the unfinished business at this session; has been displaced, and has been antagonized by various other bills from time to time. The friends of that bill have felt that it has not been fairly treated. It was taken up on a yea-and-nay vote this morning. The custom, though it is not invariable, when a conference report comes in is to have it printed and lie over for one day, and I felt that that custom ought to have been pursued in this case. Of course, the motion of the Senator from South Carolina was in order; under the rules he had a right to make it; and no fault can be found with that. I did not vote against taking up the conference report, Mr. President, because of any antagonism to it, for I shall support it, but simply for the reason that I thought the public service would not be injured in any way if the conference report should be printed and lie over for to-day, to be taken up to-morrow, giving this legislative day to the consideration of the volunteer officers' retired-list bill. That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was taken up. My reason for moving to reconsider that vote is that I voted under a misapprehension.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from North Dakota on the table.

Mr. STONE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Because of my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. Announcing as on the last roll call my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as herefore and vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). In the absence of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. GRONNA. As I have a pair with that Senator I shall have to withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I do not know how he would vote on this question if present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 29, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina to lay on the table Mr. MCCUMBER's motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to state that a point of order would have lain against this motion anyway, because the Senator from North Dakota was not competent to make it, in that he moved to reverse the result when he voted on the other side of the question.

I just want to make a general statement in reference to this matter. There is nothing in the bill that has been materially changed as it left the Senate. As the report shows, some considerable grammatical errors have been rectified, and some verbal changes have been made to clarify the text.

In reference to the matters that were in dispute, the conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate reached an agreement that did not affect the principles for which the majority of both the House and the Senate were contending. It was simply a question of arranging the matter in such form as to meet the approbation of both bodies. The particular point that we had in view was our desire to meet the views of the majority of both the House and the Senate; and I hope the Senate will see fit to agree to the conference report as it now stands.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator whether the literacy test remains in the bill as before? Was that stricken out in the conference report?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state to the Senator from New Jersey that the literacy test was not in conference at all.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That remains in the bill, then?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That remains in the bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. With that understanding and knowledge, I shall vote against the report. I should like to vote for an immigration bill, but I can not vote for it with that proposition in it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The conferees could not touch a matter that was not in conference. That provision had been kept in the bill by an overwhelming majority of both the House and the Senate, and it is in the same form that it was on the previous occasion.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I trust that the conference report may not prevail. Of course, it carries with it, as the Senator from South Carolina says, the literacy test, which I believe is utterly undemocratic and un-American.

I believe the best history our country has made has been made without that test in our immigration laws. The ability to read, while it is infinitely desirable, does not of necessity make the best citizens in the world. As I have stated before, our almshouses and our jails are brim full of men that can pass the literacy test. What we in America want is clean minds, strong arms, and honest, good, moral purpose; and I think when that is satisfied enough is satisfied. Some of the grandest citizens who have carved out their fortunes in this country, have reared splendid families, and have been liberal contributors to the welfare and the well-being of our Nation, were men who could not pass the literacy test.

As I stated when this measure was up before, when we were looking for soldiers to defend the Union the question was not whether the man could read or write. The only question was whether he was in reasonably good health, steady of nerve, with good eyesight, and was willing to line up with the cause of our country. The question of reading and writing, or the literacy test, was never raised.

I regret that in this enlightened day, when we boast of our advance in civilization and in culture and intelligence, we should press this matter further.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I shall vote against any immigration bill containing a restrictive clause respecting literacy. I have enlarged upon my views on that subject upon a former occasion, and I shall not detain the Senate at this time with their repetition. My purpose now is simply to ask for a roll call on the approval of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). The Senator from New York calls for the yeas and nays. Is the demand supported?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, before the roll is called I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether or not an amendment which I offered to the bill is in the condition that he assured me it was in when the matter was before the Senate? I refer to the clause in the bill which makes an exception in favor of those who have been subjected to political or religious persecution in foreign countries. It seemed to me that there ought to be something definite in the bill as to the evidence of the political persecution or religious persecution. I offered an amendment to that effect, providing that certain certificates from the priests or the ministers or certain officials in foreign countries should be prima facie evidence of the persecution, and upon the assurance of the Senator that that was in the bill I did not require a vote upon the amendment. I desire to ask him if that has been left in the bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I will state that those exceptions are in the bill. As to the particular points to which the Senator calls attention—the minutiæ, the working out of it—we were assured by administrative officers that those features are the ones to which they will pay attention; that they come under administration. We provide that such persons shall be excepted, and the officers of the service will determine the means by which the law shall be administered in that respect. It covers the entire question.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee to state concisely just what the differences are, if any, between the House and the Senate conferees. Are there any differences?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There are none. The agreement on the conference report is a unanimous agreement. There are no differences between the House and the Senate touching this bill.

Mr. STONE. The committee of conference was in session for a considerable time. Whatever the conclusion, there must have been, during this protracted conference, some differences which were the subject of consideration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state to the Senator that it developed that both the conferees on the part of the Senate and the conferees on the part of the House were working to exactly the same end. There was some difficulty in arriving at the proper expression of that end. We found a happy solution of the question, involving the desires of both the Senate and the House; and our report was unanimous when the phraseology had been properly framed.

Mr. STONE. Did the issue discussed relate to the literacy test of citizenship, the test which would authorize an immigrant to enter through our ports? If it was about something else, I do not care to inquire about it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It had no reference whatever to the literacy test.

Mr. LODGE. That was not in conference.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was not in conference. We did not amend it in the Senate, but accepted it as it came from the House, and therefore it was not in conference.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I did not vote for the immigration bill when it was before the Senate. The same bill has been before the Senate several times since my service here in substantially, if not exactly, the same form in which it was agreed to during the present Congress. I have always opposed the enactment of this law. My opposition to it I have stated on different occasions. It relates mainly to the so-called literacy test. Having opposed the passage of these bills from time to time, I can not in this final act of the Congress, the last the legislature can perform, agree to the conference report.

I dislike to delay the work of the Senate by any additional discussion; but even now, in the final agony, so to speak, of the consummation by the Congress of the United States of an act establishing a great public policy which is so obnoxious to my sense of justice and right, so contrary to the attitude of the great men I have been delighted to follow in their great work throughout the history of our country, and so different from the national attitude our country has adhered to upon this subject in the past, I am unwilling to have even this conference report—the climax of this tragedy, as I regard it, against that sense of human right and justice which has pervaded the American spirit for a century—agreed to without another protest.

I am conscious that this protest will be futile, as others have been; at least, I think so; but there will be to me some little personal comfort in making it at the very end, when our Senators and Representatives have determined to change the whole course of our national policy and close the door to this asylum which we were wont to praise and boast of as an asylum of liberty, a welcome place to those who were fleeing from the tyranny, oppression, and intolerance which they suffered abroad. We propose now to close the door against them; that is the meaning of this new policy. Because of their afflictions in their native land, their deprivation and denial of human equality and right, they are to be turned back by having the door shut in their faces. Under the bill which this report finally confirms every man and woman who can not absolutely be excluded upon moral grounds can come in if he or she can read a few words of some language—not the English language, but any language.

Some of these people who could come in under this law are the very people or class of people whose presence here we all protest against—that is, the disturbers of our public peace, those who undermine the sound basis upon which our governmental structure is organized and upon which the very essence of our civilization is predicated. Such as these can come in; but perchance when some man who has been the victim of an unmerciful and unpardonable persecution seeks to escape and bring his wife and children to this land, which we were wont to boast was the asylum of just such people, he may be barred if he can not comply with the literacy test here prescribed—the kind of men and women who would go out into our country and take farms and build homes and go into industrial pursuits and pursue them with avidity and with honor and strive to make themselves worthy of our American citizenship would be shut out.

Mr. President, I am reminded that the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived and that the regular order is to be laid before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. There is not any regular order.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask if it be true, as I am told, that the morning hour has now closed and there is no regular order. I do not wish to proceed out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri is in order. The conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I hope he will permit us now to have a vote on the conference report, which is pending. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and I hope he will allow the roll to be called on agreeing to the report.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I suppose I could serve no good purpose by delaying a vote. I deeply wish I could accomplish something by continuing this appeal to the conscience of the American people and the American Senate. On this line of public policy the conscience of the American Congress at least, whatever may be said of the conscience of the American people, has been seared. We have been led off by superficial reasons, as I believe, into a policy that revolutionizes the entire trend of American public thought and purpose. I shall vote "nay" on agreeing to the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the conference report, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. BECKHAM'S name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer of the pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent, and for that reason I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when the name of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was called). My colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Senate on account of official business. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement and transfer of my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as before and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent. I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). I withhold my vote on account of the absence of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], with whom I am paired. I should like the RECORD to show that, if permitted to vote, I would vote in the affirmative.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRADY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. For that reason I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], with whom I have a general pair, would vote as I would on this question, and I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED. Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is absent on official business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 10, as follows:

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392, known as the volunteer officers' retired-list bill, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. That motion, I dare say, is at this time debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in respect to the motion, particularly in view of the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] a short time ago expressing the view that some unfairness has been exhibited toward the measure now referred to in the motion of the Senator from the State of Washington. I do not care to enter into that, but I have endeavored to have the Senate proceed rather to the consideration of House bill 408. I desire to say to the Senator from the State of Michigan that I have never at any time had any sympathy whatever with any effort, if any effort has been made, to prevent the consideration of the measure in which he is so deeply interested. I feel very sure, however, that the Senate could not at any time have had in mind the relative situation of these two measures. It is true that the bill the consideration of which is now asked has been before the Senate for a long time, but it is equally true that the bill for which I ask consideration has been before the Senate for a longer time. House bill 408 was reported to the Senate by the committee having it under consideration on the 25th of January, 1916. It has had its place on the calendar ever since that time, now almost a whole year. The retired officers' bill was reported on the 27th day of March, 1916. So the bill for which I have been asking consideration has been before the Senate for more than two months longer than the volunteer officers' retired-list bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that the volunteer officers' bill was before the last Congress and passed the Senate in that Congress, and that it had been before Congress preceding that time?

Mr. WALSH. I am not acquainted with the history of the bill. I have a vague kind of recollection that it has been before the Senate in one form or another for a long time.

Mr. KENYON. Was the bill the Senator is advocating before the last Congress?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. In the preceding Congress?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it was introduced easily two years ago. So, as far as order is concerned, the priority belongs to House bill 408. It practically stands first on the calendar of measures before this body. There are only two that precede it upon the calendar, and no one seems particularly concerned in either of those measures. One of them deals with the amendment of the Constitution for women suffrage. Those who are interested in that movement are not asking for a vote upon it at this time nor consideration for it. The other is a measure in charge of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who is anxious to take it up when reached in regular order on the calendar, and he is not asking the consideration of it before. So the bill for which I am asking consideration practically stands first on the calendar before this body. I should like to have some one give some good reason why we should jump, on the calendar, from bill No. 3 to bill No. 32. I have no apology whatever to make for urging that we are entitled to consideration for this measure.

Moreover, Mr. President, I do not think it is at all necessary, after all the agitation that this subject has had during the past 10 years, to endeavor to impress on this body the importance from a national point of view of unlocking these great treasures, so that they may be developed. But the necessity for doing so, Mr. President, the urgency, was never greater than it is right now.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter addressed to the present Secretary of the Interior, under a late date, setting forth some additional reasons why this measure ought to have speedy consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, December 19, 1916.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: For the past two or three years we have been interested in observing the progress of legislation in Washington which will permit the development of the water powers of the United States on terms alike fair to the public and the investor, and inasmuch as there seems in the past to have been a decided conflict of views not only between the different groups of those interested in this legislation but also between the two Houses of Congress, we take the liberty of writing you at this time to inquire whether you are at liberty to give us your own personal views as to the prospects of legislation being enacted before Congress adjourns on March 4, 1917.

You are, of course, aware of the importance of this legislation for the development of the country and also its urgency with reference to the electrochemical and electrometallurgical industries, the national defense, the coal and food supply, and the transportation problem, so we will not take up your time discussing these matters. We do wish, however, to emphasize the importance of action within the next two or three months as compared with action later on, due to the present plentiful supply of capital in this country seeking safe and profitable forms of investment, and therefore the facility with which capital can now be obtained for investment in hydroelectric development, whereas legislative action if deferred might come at a time when present available capital would have been diverted into foreign channels either for European reconstruction after the declaration of peace or for other foreign investments.

There can be no development in navigable streams without the consent of Congress, and the character of the permit which can be obtained for development on public lands does not protect the capital invested. The projects in contemplation would result in development of many thousands of horsepower which would be utilized for pumping water for irrigation to levels beyond the reach of gravity irrigation, in utilization in the electrochemical and electrometallurgical industries, in railroad electrification, as well as for general power supply, and we are reliably informed that investments aggregating several hundred million dollars in hydroelectric development and the industries dependent thereupon now only await action by the Congress of the United States.

We believe that the necessary capital for these developments and their attendant industries can be obtained in the United States at the present time if the legislation, when passed by Congress, adequately safeguards the principal invested so that it is secure against confiscation and also permits the earning thereon of a fair return.

Very truly, yours,

HARRIS, FORBES & CO.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the necessity for the development of these great water powers for transportation purposes has been frequently adverted to in this Chamber. Nearly 400 miles of one of the transcontinental lines are now being operated electrically, and another of the great transcontinental lines is now engaged in an effort to find available water-power sites, which, being developed, will provide electricity for the propulsion of its trains. That enterprise awaits some legislation which will enable the utilization of the water-power sites which exist in abundance in the territory through which this great system goes.

It is not only that, Mr. President, but we are confronted to-day with a serious situation. A large number of the newspapers of the country, the most reliable source of information for the people, as much a necessity in our present-day existence as the bread and meat that form our daily food, have been obliged to suspend because of the extraordinary price to which print paper has risen. Out in all the western country in which these power sites exist there are limitless quantities of timber available for the production of paper, and the only other requisite, power, exists there in abundance. At the present time I am able to advise the Senate that a large number of enterprises are on foot for the establishment through the Northwest of great manufactories of print paper and other qualities of paper out of timber which is of such a character upon the mountains of that country that it is now practically valueless. These enterprises are all at a standstill until some legislation is enacted which will enable the development of the water-power sites.

I do not stand here to advocate the particular measure nor to argue in favor of one method of disposition of these sites as against another, but I do insist that at the present time there is no subject so earnestly and so urgently demanding the consideration of Congress as this matter of the disposition of the water-power sites. However my esteemed friend from the State of Washington may be interested in the passage of the Volunteer officers' retired list bill, I think he will quite agree with me that, considered nationally, the other is the more urgent measure.

I do not desire at this time, Mr. President, to enter into any consideration of the merits of the Volunteer officers' retired list bill, but I send to the desk a letter which came to me in the mail a few days ago relating to this particular measure and offer it as a part of the record, so that the public may judge which of these two measures ought to have the consideration of this body at the present time. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Montana that this letter was read into the RECORD the other day by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I do not know whether or not, under those circumstances, he would desire it again read.

Mr. WALSH. I did not know that fact. Of course, if the letter has been previously read, I shall not insist that it be read again.

Mr. JONES. It was read the other day during the discussion of the volunteer officers' retired bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Was the letter read to the Senate, or was it inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES. This same letter was read. I myself received a copy of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Senators about us here express a desire to hear it again read.

Mr. JONES. Very well. I have merely made the suggestion.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, which, entire, is as follows:

1302 TAYLOR STREET,
San Francisco, Cal., December, 1916.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: There is now before Congress a bill (S. 392; H. R. 386) known as the retired volunteer officers' bill, on which a vote is now pending in the United States Senate, but which has been postponed from time to time by reason of objection of Senators.

I am writing to you to ask that if this bill ever comes up for passage you will vote against it. I ask this as an old soldier, who is vitally interested, and therefore has a right to a candid hearing.

I am opposed to this bill; so vehemently opposed to it that I can hardly speak calmly about it; nor can I understand how it is that the great body of the Grand Army of the Republic and the greater body of veterans of the Civil War can be so silent or apathetic, unless, indeed, they do not understand.

Up to the time that this stupendous piece of treachery was concocted all veterans "stood together" and were loyal to each other, seeking legislation for the common good. Now the comparatively small percentage who wore shoulder straps have thrown down their comrades and are seeking to make laws greatly to their own advantage, which is "class legislation."

Most of them are already receiving the highest pensions paid under present laws, viz, $30 per month. Not content with this, which is often double what humbler comrades of the rank and file are getting, they have the hardihood to project a scheme the logic and language of which is: "To h—l with the old soldier, let him go to the home and eat beans, so we can get a retired officer's pay of $100 or $150 per month, live like retired gentlemen, and throw bouquets at ourselves for our astuteness." A dastardly desertion and betrayal of the men they once honorably stood with.

As a basis and proof of my premises and prayer, I offer the following facts:

The present pension bill (Sherwood) takes into account two things—age and service, and these are and must be the only true foundation for all claims. Let us examine.

Have the proponents of this bill any advantage or disadvantage in years which needs special compensation?

None whatever. This is obvious to everybody without argument.

Their claim, then, must rest on the assumption of "superior service." Let us see.

The company to which they belonged was recruited in the neighborhood or town where they had been schoolboys and had grown up together. When the company was full, an election of officers was held. Always two or more tickets, but one successful candidate for each position—a captain and two lieutenants—not more than a shade smarter than the defeated candidates.

Being promoted to these positions they now enjoy the distinction, the honors, the authority, which accompany them.

What did they bring to these positions?

Any superior education or preparation? None whatever.

Any acquaintance with tactics? None.

Any knowledge of strategy? None.

Any familiarity with military engineering? None.

Any understanding of problems of transportation? None.

Anything about subsistence? Nothing.

Anything about clothing or sanitation? Nothing.

Anything about the school of the soldier? Nothing.

No years, or even days, were ever spent in study at a military school. Not a dollar was ever paid as the price of qualification.

We each bought "Hardee" and began the "school of the soldier" together.

Did they march farther or faster than their neighbor boys? They did not. Did they endure hardships more severe than their schoolmates? They did not.

Did their counsels overcome the mighty combinations of treason? They were not asked.

Like the rest of us they simply obeyed orders.

We stood in line while we could and ran when we had to.

As sprinters, they were a good company average. When taken prisoners, they were first to be exchanged.

What then did they do during the war which justifies this claim? Nothing.

They were abundantly paid; they thought so themselves, then.

What have they done since? Nothing.

They have enjoyed the savings of those years. They followed their own interests untroubled by "orders" or "service," and 90 per cent of them have for 50 years occupied the best positions in civil life.

On what, then, in God's name, are they resting their preposterous claims?

On the ghost of an old service, exhumed after 50 years; dusted off and revalued by a committee of interests, and pressed with insulting effrontery upon a patient and long-suffering Congress.

The weapons are: Untrue assumptions, illogical arguments, specious reasoning clouding the real issue, and astounding and impudent persistence.

The retired Army officer spent his whole life, until his years retired him, in the service of his country.

The Volunteer officer never gave his years to the service of his country; he never was "retired"; he was mustered out with the rest of us and has followed his own sweet will as a civilian for 50 years, untrammelled by "orders," and has been at the "pie counter" most of the time.

Honorable sir, I carried, when fully equipped, about 45 pounds. The captain about one-ninth as much and had a trunk and transportation for the rest.

My Belgian rifle weighed 14 pounds, exclusive of ammunition. His beautiful sword one-ninth as much.

For this service I received $13 per month; he received nine times that amount and garnered the honors and feminine smiles.

"When knighthood was in flower."

He was fully paid when in service; when that ceased, his claim ceased as completely and permanently as mine.

If he has further claims, so have I; and not in ration of 1 to 9, but equal.

Let me beseech you in the name of fair dealing to vote against and defeat this bill.

H. B. WORCESTER,
Company B, Eighteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, as I understand the matter now before us, it is not as to the merits of this bill, but rather whether or not we shall decide to take the bill up for consideration. I wish to say that within a week I have received a letter from the daughter of a Vermont officer; and it recalls to my mind the fact that of all the officers above the rank of colonel who served in the War of the Rebellion from my own State, every one living in the State, as I believe, and also one out of the State, is dead. The letter which I have received is from the daughter of the last officer of the rank of colonel going from the State of Vermont to the War of the Rebellion. Now, it seems to me that we ought at least to pass upon this measure before they have all gone to join "the silent majority."

This bill has been before us previously, and has been passed by the Senate on one or more occasions. Having debated it, we understand its provisions, and I trust that we may now take it up and pass judgment upon it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire whether it would be in order at this time to move to substitute House bill 408 for the volunteer officers' bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that motion would not now be in order. The vote must be taken on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate, as I wish to ask for a unanimous-consent order. The bill which provides a civil government for Porto Rico has been before this body now for more than six months. Porto Rico has no representative in the form of a Commissioner in the House of Representatives, the former Commissioner having died in November last. This bill is practically a charter of liberty for the people of Porto Rico. Their representatives and delegates here are anxiously urging the consideration and passage of the bill.

In view of the situation which now confronts us, and of the important fact that the bill should be soon passed, I should like to get the consent of the Senate to make it the special order for next Monday at 2 o'clock. It seems to me that that can be done. If we delay action on the bill much longer we can not possibly get the measure through at this session.

The Porto Ricans did not have an election last fall when they were entitled to have one, because of the fact that this bill was then pending, and it was thought it would not be wise to have two elections within six months or a year of each other. Consequently, it is important that the matter should be disposed of during this session. I am not particular about the day to be fixed for its consideration, but it does seem to me that I ought to be able to get unanimous consent to have the bill made a special order for 2 o'clock next Monday. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 9533) to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes, be made the special order for 2 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, is that request in order while the motion that I have made is pending?

Mr. SHAFROTH. A request for a unanimous-consent agreement is in order, though a motion would not be.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado is not in order, because the bill for which he asks consideration is not before the Senate. A ruling to that effect has been made here within the last week.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But I am trying to get the bill before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. There is already a question pending before the Senate, and I object.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There may be a question pending, but requests for unanimous-consent agreements are made during all hours of the day, and no objection is made to that being done. If the Senator from Utah persists in his objection my request can not be agreed to, there is no doubt about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection, as the Chair understands, to the Senator's request. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to take up Senate bill 392.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, out of order, I offer a report from the joint subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee, appointed under Senate resolution No. 60.

Mr. SMOOT. I must object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let us hear what the Senator from Nevada offers.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I present a report——

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the offering of any report at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have the floor, as I understand, and I have a right to offer anything I desire. I do not ask for any action upon the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. There is now pending here a motion to take up a bill, and, until that is voted upon, one objection to the presentation of a report of a committee, out of order, is sufficient. Mr. President, after we vote upon this bill, I shall not have any objection, so far as that is concerned, to allowing, by unanimous consent, the presentation of a report that will not take any time; but at this particular moment I object to the reception of any report, and I ask for a vote upon the pending motion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not understand that an objection will lie against the mere offering or presentation of a report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President. It is not a question of an objection, but I make the point of order that pending the motion before the Senate nothing else is in order in the way of a committee report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRYAN obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the Chair has announced that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I very much regret that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has been called from the Chamber, because I intend to reply to some extent to some of the arguments he has put forth in favor of this bill. The same arguments are used for this bill that are used for every bill which is designed to increase pensions. Last summer, over the objection and against the better judgment of a great many Senators, because of pressure brought to bear by members of committees, the Senate took up and passed without any discussion at all a bill which will cost annually between fifteen and twenty million dollars; a bill reported without seeking the judgment of the department as to what it would cost; a bill to increase the pensions of widows who had reached the age of 70 years. It passed the Senate under the statement that it would only cost a very small amount and that it provided for a worthy class. I had a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions a day or two ago, the purpose of which was to ask the Committee on Appropriations, and myself as a member of that committee, to vote for an increased clerical force because of the passage of that bill; and in his letter he said that there had been 144,000 applications for increase under the bill passed last summer, of which 133,000 had been granted. Those increases were from $12 to $20 a month, or over $13,000,000, and there were thousands of original applications besides. I figured it up roughly and ascertained that the cost of that legislation will be somewhere between fifteen and twenty million dollars annually to the taxpayers of this country.

The Senator from Michigan, as I understand, bases his bill upon two propositions. First, upon precedent. He says that in 1828 or 1832 Congress granted retired pay to volunteer officers of the Revolutionary Army. In reading the hearings upon this bill, or one similar to it, two years ago, we are made to understand that there were no volunteer officers in the Revolutionary War; but that is the precedent. You can find a precedent for almost any kind of pension legislation. I suggest that it is not sufficient reason for the passage of this bill because back in 1828 or 1832 Congress then did a thing that we would not do to-day. In fact, Mr. President, if one will take the trouble to examine the legislation of Congress prior to 1820, he will find that Congress had become so liberal then that a limitation was put on by the act of 1820, and, as a result of that act, a great number of names were stricken from the rolls. Congress subsequently replaced them on the rolls along about 1828 and 1832, when it was most lavish in its pension expenditures. So much for the precedent.

The Senator from Michigan, in the second place, bases the claim for this legislation on what he calls "a sacred promise." If there were a promise it ought to be kept. If the Senate is so much interested in keeping a "sacred promise," why do not Senators attempt to ascertain whether or not any promise was ever made? because I undertake to say that the Senator from Michigan is wholly in error in the conclusion that any promise of the character he assumes was ever made. He takes the act of July 22, 1861, and quotes from it a provision that the officers and men in the Volunteer Army shall be placed upon the same footing as to pay and allowances as officers and men in similar corps of the Regular Army. Then he quotes from an act passed three days later, July 25, 1861, which supplements that act, in which the language is used "in all respects." From that the Senator argues that it was "a sacred promise" of this Government that officers and men of the Volunteer Army should be entitled to the retirement pay that now goes to the officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. President, I have taken the trouble to examine the Congressional Globe containing the debates upon those two bills. There was considerable discussion upon the first of those two acts, namely, the act of July 22, 1861, but there was no discussion whatever as to the second act. It is perfectly apparent to me that Congress was not considering the question of retired pay or the question of seeking to place Volunteer officers upon an equal footing with Regular officers in any respect except for like services. The act of July 22, in section 5, provides:

That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall in all respects be placed on the footing, as to pay and allowances, of similar corps of the Regular Army.

The act passed three days later provides:

They shall be subject to the rules and articles of war—

That was one reason for the passage of the act of July 25, 1861, the act of July 22 not having provided that they should be subject to the rules and articles of war—and shall be upon the footing, in all respects, with similar corps of the United States Army, and shall be mustered into the service "for during the war."

The act of July 22, 1861, did not call for their muster in during the war, but for a certain period of time. These were the two purposes Congress had in view at that time.

There is another reason why Congress was not considering the retirement pay of volunteer officers and making their retirement pay the same as the retirement pay of officers in the Regular Army, and it is a conclusive reason: That is, that there was no provision at that time for the retirement of officers of the Regular Army. Senators say that there was "a sacred promise" because Congress passed these two acts, known as the volunteer acts, at the breaking out of the war, and they cite the general orders. Why, Mr. President, the general orders say nothing but this:

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 3, 1861.

The following acts are published for the information of the Army—

And then follows a transcript of the acts of Congress.

These two acts were passed in July. The act providing for retirement pay was passed August 3, 1861, showing conclusively that at the time the previous acts were passed it was not in the mind of anybody to provide for retirement pay.

Mr. President, what I have just said relates to the so-called "sacred promise." Senators say that the Senate wants to vote upon this bill; that they desire to discuss it; that they are interested in it; and yet only six of them are here displaying their interest in the bill. I have just referred to the acts of Congress, and have read from the bills passed by Congress to show that the contention of the Senator from Michigan, upon which he bases his whole case, has no foundation in the legislation of Congress.

Mr. President, on August 3, 1861, Congress passed the retirement act for officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will it divert the Senator from Florida now if I ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the Senator made any investigation as to the probable cost to the Government of this legislation?

Mr. BRYAN. It was estimated a year ago that it would cost some $12,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Per annum?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes. The latest estimate I have seen is about $8,000,000. That is a mere bagatelle! Why should Senators interest themselves in that?

Some one says that there was a "sacred promise" given, and six Senators remain to ascertain that that was not so, and the rest of them do not know whether it was so or not. There could not have been in July, 1861, a promise to put volunteer officers upon the retired list along with officers of the Regular Army, because there was no retired list available at that time to the officers of the Regular Army. It seems to me, Mr. President, that is a complete answer to the claim that these men became officers in the Army under a promise to be retired with pay.

Section 15 of the act of August 3, 1861, contains the provision as to retirement, and it does not apply to officers of the Regular Army any more than it does to the volunteers. It reads:

That any commissioned officer of the Army or of the Marine Corps who shall have served as such for 40 consecutive years may, upon his own application to the President of the United States, be placed upon the list of retired officers with the pay and emoluments allowed by this act.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield further to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. In practical effect that provision for retirement would be limited to officers of the Regular Army, for the reason that no officer served in the Volunteer Army for 40 years.

Mr. BRYAN. But if the volunteer officer served in the Regular Army for 40 years he would be entitled to retirement under that provision.

Mr. ROBINSON. But there was no officer in that class, was there?

Mr. BRYAN. O, yes; there were quite a number who remained in the Regular Army, who devoted their lives to that service, and retired; but the pending measure is a proposition to retire volunteer officers, even though they may have served only for a day.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I did not make the thought in my mind clear. An act passed now with that limitation in it, or that act, if it is still in force, would not apply to any other than officers of the Regular Army, would it?

Mr. BRYAN. No; and it does not apply to them until they have served 40 years in the Army. They must have given 40 years of service to this Government before it applies to them; and yet Senators say that it is a discrimination unless you give the same retirement pay to the man who served three months in the Volunteer Army. Provision for retirement pay was made in the act of August 3, 1861; there was none before that time.

Now, Mr. President, that was understood by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and it was understood by the legislative committee of the volunteer officers who are asking for this legislation. I desire to read some extracts from the hearings, but before doing so I wish to take up the report of the committee as to some amendments. The Senator from Michigan when he introduced the bill incorporated in it the words "who was honorably discharged from service for disability." That would mean that a man discharged for disability would be placed in the same category as the retired officers of the Regular Army; but the committee in its report recommends that the words "for disability" be stricken out and the words "by muster out, resignation, or otherwise," be substituted; so that all an officer need to have done was to have been in the Army. The same amendment has been recommended at another place, giving to these men, if they served less than six months as officers in the Volunteer Army, one-half the pay of a captain in the Regular Army when he is retired after 40 years of service; and, if they served two years, three-fourths of the pay of a captain in the Regular Army.

Now, upon what do they base that? Maj. Alfred Beers, one of the past commanders of the Grand Army of the Republic, was before this committee. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] asked him:

Do you think that that applied only to volunteer officers as long as they were in the service of the United States?

That is, this retirement plan.

Maj. BEERS. No, sir. Our view of it is that it applied to them when they retired from the service of the United States; that they were placed on the same footing in every respect; and that that was the intent and that that was the meaning.

Senator DU PONT. A Regular officer might retire from the service of the United States in two or three ways. The most common way was to be mustered out of the service, although numbers of them resigned, and some were discharged for disability.

If they did that, they did not get retirement pay, and do not now.

If Regular officers resigned or if the Regular Army was reduced, as it has been half a dozen times, the officers who disappeared from the rolls of the Regular Army have no claim to the remuneration of the other officers. At one time I was an officer of the Regular Army. I resigned many years ago. Do you understand that I have a claim to be put on the retired list now?

That was Senator DU PONT asking this question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRYAN. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Florida is making a very interesting and instructive statement concerning this measure, and I think there ought to be a larger number of Senators present to hear him make it. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	McLean	Smoot
Bankhead	Harding	Martine, N. J.	Stone
Beckham	Hardwick	Nelson	Sutherland
Brady	Hitchcock	Newlands	Swanson
Brandegee	Hughes	Norris	Thomas
Bryan	James	Overman	Thompson
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Underwood
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Vardaman
Clapp	Jones	Pittman	Walsh
Clark	Kenyon	Poindexter	Watson
Cummins	Kirby	Robinson	Weeks
Curtis	Lane	Shafroth	Williams
Fall	Lee, Md.	Sheppard
Fernald	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.
Fletcher	Lodge	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE (S. DOC. NO. 668).

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask leave, out of order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] has the floor. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to present a report which I am compelled to make to-day under joint resolution No. 60.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I make the point of order that under the rules the Senator from Florida can not yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to inquire whether or not the resolution which the Senator desires to report has any privilege of any kind?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It has, in my judgment, because joint resolution No. 60 requires a report to-day.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that under the rules even a privileged report can not be offered while a Senator has the floor speaking.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator from Nevada to state the nature of the report, and then I will decide whether I will yield to him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Some time ago, at the last session of Congress, the Senate passed joint resolution No. 60, which was concurred in by the House, authorizing the appointment of a joint subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House to investigate certain questions and directing them to report to Congress on the 8th day of January. This is the 8th day of January, and I am under compulsion to make this report to-day, and I am trying to get it in.

Mr. JONES. The day is not gone yet, Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I trust that the Senator from Washington will not insist on my being committed for contempt to-morrow for having violated the order of the Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida yields the floor. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I object to the presentation of a report now, out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present very temporary occupant of the Chair, of course, is not as familiar with the rules as he should be, but he is of the opinion that this is a privileged matter.

Mr. JONES. There is no privilege about it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let it be read, so that the Chair can ascertain what it is.

The Secretary read as follows:

JANUARY 8, 1917.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The Joint Subcommittee on Interstate Commerce appointed pursuant to Senate joint resolution No. 60 (Public, No. 25) reports that, owing to the late adjournment of the last session of Congress and the ensuing election campaign, it was impossible to hold any meetings of the joint subcommittee except for purposes of organization until the 20th day of November, 1916, when it met at Washington; that since that date and up to and including the 2d day of December, 1916, it held almost daily sessions and hearings upon the matters referred to the subcommittee for investigation; that the pressure of the work in Congress during this short session, both in the committee and on the floor, made it impossible for the members of the joint subcommittee further to attend to and complete its duties during the pending session, and that they therefore concluded to postpone further sessions until after the 4th of March, 1917, and meanwhile to request of Congress an extension of the time of report to the first Monday in December, 1917.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, Chairman.
W. C. ADAMSON, Vice Chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the point of order to the Senate, as to whether or not the report is in order; but if it is debated, the Chair will make a ruling of his own.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has objection been made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order has been made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I request the Senator from Washington to withdraw his point of order. The report has been read, and it might as well be in. I do not intend to discuss it in any way. It will take no time.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, if this report should be received now, by unanimous consent, it would not interfere with the standing of the motion that has been made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; it will not interfere with it in any way.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope that will be agreed to. Under the rule, an objection will carry it over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the report being received? There being none, it will be received.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. JONES that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, according to my count there are considerably more Senators here now than when I made the statement in reply to the argument of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I want to say to Senators that it seems to me that this is rather a serious question. If there is a sacred promise on the part of Congress, Congress ought to redeem it; but I undertake to say that the Senator from Michigan is altogether mistaken in supposing that Congress ever made the promise, or that there was anything in the legislation that justified the conclusion that Congress was undertaking, by the acts of July 22 and July 25, 1861, to give volunteer officers the right to go upon a retired list, because at that time there was no retired list. The act of July 22, 1861, provided for the calling of 500,000 volunteers for service of three years. I looked up the debate upon that matter. There was considerable debate. Three days later Congress passed an additional act to supplement the act of July 22. It was not passed with any idea about retired pay. It was passed for two purposes: To make the volunteer officers subject to the Rules and Articles of War and to change the law as to the period of enlistment and make it during the period of the war. That is conclusive proof, to my mind, that Congress could not possibly have had in mind the view now entertained, half a century later, by the volunteer officers of the Civil War, because at that time there were no retirement provisions for officers in the Regular Army, and it could not have been for any such purpose. Therefore, Mr. President, when we defeat this bill we are not breaking any promise, express or implied, ever made to the officers of the Volunteer Army.

The Senator from Michigan said that the cost was an immaterial matter. I agree to that if the good faith of this Government was pledged. But, sir, we might as well understand now that if Congress passes this legislation on the theory that we had promised the volunteer officers that they should be retired at three-quarters of the pay of a captain in the Regular Army, the claim of those living to-day is no higher than the claim of those who have died; and if we recognize this claim, why are we not bound to go back and pay to the legal representatives of deceased officers retirement pay until they died?

When Congress came to pass a provision that officers should be retired it required that they should have served 40 years in the Army. That is open to those who were in the Civil War as volunteers and to those in the Regular Army. If a Regular Army officer quits during his service, he is not placed upon the retired list. He is in exactly the same condition that a man in the volunteer service was. He must have completed that term of service. He must have devoted his life to the military service of his country. Again, he has not drawn a pension through all these intervening years; and if you are going to put these men who served a few days or a few months as officers in the Volunteer Army on the footing, as you call it, of officers in the Regular Army, then ought you not to require them to give back their pensions? They could not do that. Otherwise you place them in consideration high above the officers who have spent a lifetime in the Regular Army.

Now, let us see. Maj. Beers, who represented this association before the Committee on Military Affairs, was asked by Senator DU PONT about this act of July, 1861:

> Do you think that that applied only to volunteer officers as long as they were in the service of the United States?
> Maj. BEERS. No, sir. Our view of it is that it applied to them when they retired from the service of the United States; that they were placed on the same footing in every respect, and that that was the intent and that that was the meaning.

I read this because the senior Senator from Delaware was an officer—an officer in the Regular Army, if you please. Here is what he said in reply to that suggestion:

> A Regular Army officer might retire from the service of the United States in two or three ways. The most common way was to be mustered out of the service, although numbers of them resigned, and some were discharged for disability.

If they were discharged for disability due to their service, they could not get on this roll, and yet these men who resigned voluntarily, after spending 50 years in civil life, would get the same benefits that they would get through having given all their time to the Army.

Senator DU PONT continues:

> If Regular officers resigned, or if the Regular Army was reduced, as it has been half a dozen times, the officers who disappeared from the rolls of the Regular Army have no claim to the remuneration of the other officers. At one time I was an officer of the Regular Army. I resigned many years ago. Do you understand that I have a claim to be put on the retired list now?
>
> Maj. BEERS. Not if you voluntarily surrendered your connection with the Army.
>
> Senator DU PONT. A great many volunteer officers did so. Many officers resigned.
> Maj. BEERS. Yes.
> Senator DU PONT. According to your statement, then, all of those officers who voluntarily resigned would be eliminated.
> Maj. BEERS. Personally, I think all of those who voluntarily terminated their connection with the Army would have no claim.

Now, there is the man representing the Volunteer Officers' Association before the Committee on Military Affairs conceding that they have no claim; yet, on the other hand, we are appealed to here in the Senate as violating a sacred pledge if we do not pass this bill.

> Senator DU PONT. Exactly. That is what I wanted to bring out.
> Maj. BEERS. But those who served their time and were mustered out, or who were discharged by order of the War Department at the close of the war, that class of officers would be entirely on the same footing.

If they remained in the Regular Army, they were on the same footing. If they remained the same time, they got the same allowance. If, for disability or by reason of resignation, they quit, they could not get it.

Now, let us look at this bill. It does not allow a man in the Regular Army to quit within the 40 years. If he quits, he can not get any kind of retired pay. He may have served 25 years and then quit; he may have served in the Civil War and served 39 years and quit, and he would not get on the retired list; and yet an officer who served for two or three months would be placed on the retired list by this bill.

Senators, I can not understand why the Senate wishes to take a step like this. As Senators point to precedents to-day, as they point back to how the officers of the Revolutionary Army were treated in 1832, so a few years later, or maybe only a few months later, we will have the same thing to go through with in connection with the officers of the Spanish-American War. Were they promised to be placed upon the same footing as the officers of the Regular Army, and are they entitled now to come in with a bill like this? Let us see.

Here is the bill that was approved April 22, 1898, using in very large part the verbiage of the act of 1861. I quote from section 12:

> That all officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army, and of the militia of the States when in the service of the United States, shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as that of officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army.

Yet they served for two or three months while that war was going on; they went back to their homes; and I say to you that if a sacred promise was made to the volunteer officers in the Civil War, a like promise, as sacred, was made to the volunteer officers in the Spanish-American War. It was fought by the Regulars. They volunteered, but they did not therefore go there. They were willing to go; but for only a few months' service are you going to undertake to give those men a standing and to give them the money it will cost to place them on a footing of equality with those who have served for 40 years in the Regular Army?

That is what is involved here, Mr. President. I feel that no question of the honor of the Government of the United States is involved here.

The Senator from Michigan says that we have been unfair in dealing with the volunteer officers of the Civil War; that we have belittled their services. I do not know who has done that, Mr. President. I should regret very much if anything I have said is subject to such a construction. I have tried very hard not to do it. I have no such feeling about it. The appeal is made here in the Senate to help them because they need the money. That is not a genuine appeal, because there was stricken out of this bill a provision that those whose income amounted to $2,400 a year should not be placed upon the retired list. Protest was made by them that they were not asking for the enactment of this legislation because they needed it; that it was a debt we owed them, and they wanted it for that reason.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator has given careful study to this question. I should like to ask him if all of the beneficiaries of this proposed measure are not on the pension roll to-day?

Mr. BRYAN. Why, of course. They are all on the pension roll.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the average pension?

Mr. BRYAN. A dollar a day, I should say. If they are 80 years old, of course, it is a dollar a day—$360 a year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator know whether that is all the pension they are receiving?

Mr. BRYAN. No; it is not all. I say this to the Senator, and I am glad he has interrupted me just at that point: The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said that a great injustice was done to the officers of the Civil War by the act of 1890, because he said that prior to the act of 1890 these men drew their pensions according to their disabilities; that is, they drew higher pensions than privates or noncommissioned officers; but by the act of 1890 that privilege was taken away from them. I do not so read that act. I shall be very much surprised if that is so, because if that is true, it is the first time that any pension bill ever reduced the provisions of any other, or ever took away anything from anybody on earth. Let us see if there is anything in that contention. I read from section 2 of the act of June 27, 1890. I believe a mere reading of the act will show that it does not do so.

SEC. 2. That all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late War of the Rebellion and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from any mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which so incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support; and in determining such inability each and every infirmity shall be duly considered, and the aggregate of the disabilities shown be rated, and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Bureau of Pensions, after the passage of this act, upon proof that the disability or disabilities then existed, and shall continue during the existence of the same: Provided, That persons who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Bureau of Pensions, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such form as he may prescribe, showing themselves entitled thereto, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim and receiving his pension under any other general or special act: Provided, however, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period: And provided further, That rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed under this act.

The act of 1890 did not interfere with the provision for specific payment for injuries. The act of 1890 was intended to place men upon the pension roll who could not trace their injuries back to the service. There is a schedule here of allowances for disabilities to officers printed in the laws by the Bureau of Pensions to-day. I think it is well known among Senators that some veterans of the Civil War who have been injured are getting much larger pay than they could possibly get under the Sherwood Act or any of the acts for mere service.

I do not think that contention is a good one. The act of 1890, in my judgment, did not take anything away from these officers. Until that time they could not be placed upon the pension roll unless they had been injured. The act of 1890 was intended to place them and their widows upon the rolls even though they had not been injured.

In the hearing to which I have referred the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] asked Maj. Beers this question:

Senator VARDAMAN. Is it the purpose of this bill—which I have not read—to put the officers who served only during the war on the same footing with men who have given their entire lives to the Army?
Maj. BEERS. Certainly.

It struck the Senator from Mississippi as a peculiar proposition, but answered in this way there is no room for any difference:

Senator VARDAMAN. I just wanted to know.
Maj. BEERS. Certainly.

Then Senator HITCHCOCK asked this question:

Senator HITCHCOCK. Will you explain to me this, which I have not fully understood, whether this claim of the volunteer officers is only because they think their case is analogous to that of the Regular Army officers or whether it is based upon some promise made, either at the time of enlistment or during the war, by the President or some one else?
Maj. BEERS. It is based upon both claims.

* * * * * * *

I read the acts of Congress placing the volunteer forces upon the same footing as the Regular Army and also extracts from the orders of the War Department conveying the same assurance.

There is no extract from the War Department in these hearings or any that I have been able to find except a mere transmission of the act of Congress.

I believe I will put in here section 15 of the act of August 3, 1861, so that there can be an answer of record to this claim:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That any commissioned officer of the Army or of the Marine Corps who shall have served as such for 40 consecutive years may, upon his own application to the President of the United States, be placed upon the list of retired officers, with the pay and emoluments allowed by this act.

Further the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] asked:

Senator HITCHCOCK. So that there are two bases for the claim.
Maj. BEERS. There are two bases for the claim; and then, in addition to that, the volunteer officers claim the passage of the bill as a matter of justice to them.
Senator HITCHCOCK. Yes.
Maj. BEERS. For instance, the volunteer officers who were discharged from the Army at the close of the Civil War were not compensated for their responsibilities and were not fairly compensated for the service which they had rendered, so that in honor the Government, in favor of the volunteer officers, should make this provision for them.

Then he continues:

The matter of compensation is entirely secondary, and the matter of compensation by the way of retired pay is a matter entirely of gratitude by the Government for meritorious service rendered the Government, and not by way of payment of a legal compensation.

So finally, Mr. President, it comes down to the admission that there is no promise here and never was. What are we doing? We are following a dangerous precedent and we are setting another dangerous precedent. We are inviting the officers in the Spanish-American War to come in and make the same claim, because they went into service under a like act in 1898, and the plain language of the statute does not discriminate against a man, whether he entered the service in the volunteer force or through the Regular Army. In either event, if he remains in the Regular Army during 40 years, he is placed upon the retired list, and neither a man in the Regular Army nor in the volunteer service is entitled to be upon the list unless he has devoted that time in the Army to the service of his country.

As to Maj. Beers, I think I know him. If he is the man I am thinking about, he is a most excellent gentleman, and he was very frank with the committee. Senator VARDAMAN asked him this question:

Senator VARDAMAN. Do you think that, as a matter of justice, a man who served only four years or two years or three years, and after the war was over went back to his home and assumed his usual vocation, is entitled to the same pay in dollars and cents as the man who has given his entire life and has had no opportunity to make more than a living, or to lay by something for a rainy day, or for his old age?
Maj. BEERS. On the other hand, Senator, the man you refer to is a man who has been educated at the expense of the Government.
Senator DU PONT. Not always.
Maj. BEERS. The great majority of those men are men who have been so educated.
Senator VARDAMAN. Well, suppose he has been educated by the Government. That is his vocation, his life's work, and he has no opportunity and no time to devote to other things. He simply lives upon his salary. He takes no thought of the problem of meat and bread, and the Government says to him, "You give your life to the service of this branch of the Government and we will take care of you. You do not have to do this." The man who serves three or four years, after the war is over returns to his home and assumes his usual vocation, and he is not dependent upon the Government. I think, so far as service is concerned, that the man who bore the musket——

The chairman interrupted the junior Senator from Mississippi, and said he thought it better not to have any interruption. They had reached a very interesting point in the discussion, though, Mr. President. They had reached a point which ought to be in the mind of the Senate when they come to perpetrate this injustice upon the taxpayers of the country and upon the military arm of our Government, because I do not hesitate to say that it is wrong to take this money and give it to these people under the plea of a promise as if they had devoted their lives in the military service when, as a matter of fact, they have not.

I hope that by nothing I say I may be understood as intimating that their services were not meritorious; that they were not patriotic. I have thought that no money could pay them for the great service they rendered to their country. I would rather see them fixed upon that plane than to see men come here and undertake to establish a legal claim against Congress based upon a statute that allowed officers in the Regular Army to be retired after 40 years of service. Maj. Beers proceeds:

And that is another reason for its passage, because there is a precedent for the bill which we ask for, although it is a precedent not to the same extent that we ask for it.

It is suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] that if we are to have war we must depend upon volunteer forces in time of war, and if we are ungrateful hereafter, as we have been heretofore, we need not expect service.

Mr. President, I have a higher opinion of the citizenship of this country than that. I do not believe that the thought of pay occurred to a single man who enlisted upon either side in the Civil War. I have no doubt if war should come again they would go into it again. Neither do I think the claim that the public has been ungrateful can be sustained by the Senator from Michigan or by anyone else. It was said by a very distinguished gentleman appearing before the committee in the consideration of the Sherwood bill in 1912 that no such claim could ever be made. Consider that men, although they could trace no injury to their service, are being paid to-day, those of service of any length, as much as a dollar a day, and that there has been expended in money alone, leaving out the bounties given, nearly $5,000,000,000 in pensions.

Mr. President, if we should stop inventing new classes and allow those who are on the rolls to remain as they are, it seems to me we would be doing a good work. I am willing to leave matters as they are, but I do not think there can be any justification for bills of this character. I do not believe there is any justification for another bill pending here, to place the widows of all deceased soldiers who enlisted in the Spanish-American War upon the pension rolls.

I want to know how you are going to get away from this proposition: If you pay the men who are now living retired pay, how are you going to say to the representatives of those who are dead that you will not pay them, and when you do that it is going to mount into hundreds of millions. Even this bill alone, if that were not done, will be pointed to as a precedent by the officers in the Spanish-American War, and if Congress remains in the same frame of mind that it is to-day such a bill will pass.

I feel, Mr. President, like making an appeal to the Democrats at least. Let us slow up a little on this legislation. We passed a bill not six months ago that added between fifteen and twenty million dollars to the annual cost of administering the affairs of the Government in the matter of pensions.

Here is another one of $10,000,000. How are we going to justify it?

The Senator from Michigan says it was reported by a Democrat. Yes; Mr. President, the Republicans were a little more shrewd when this bill visited them when they were in power. They never allowed it to come out of the committee, or they did only in the last days of the session, when it could not be possibly voted upon in both Houses.

It seems to me when you added fifteen or twenty million dollars last year that that ought to be enough. Now you are going to add $10,000,000 more. Then it is going to be said, as it is said now, that the American Republic is ungrateful. Here we are engaged in passing this legislation, which that old soldier from California, formerly from Wisconsin, said is class legislation, applied even to the privates in the Civil War. The water-power bill can wait; the corrupt-practices act, to try to better the conditions of elections in this country, can stand aside; and the Democrats on this side turn over the legislation of the Senate to a Senator who has his heart set, and has had for eight years, upon giving this gratuity to the volunteer officers of the Civil War.

Mr. President, I have said about all that I intend to say. If the Senate has made up its mind to do that, I do not believe I will interfere much longer. I have felt that if Senators understood what was involved they would not vote for the bill. They do not understand it; they are not here; they have not the time to investigate it. It is labeled pensions, and it is said in a general way in eloquent tones that it is to carry out a sacred promise. Of course, they say, let us make good our sacred promise, and they come in and vote. It is only $10,000,000 here, and it was $20,000,000 there, making $30,000,000.

The clerks and employees of this Government are asking Congress to help them to get the bare necessities of life. Here is a class of gentlemen unwilling that those men who are receiving as much as $2,400 a year income shall be excluded from this roll. They would get $1,800 a year, nearly three times the pay of men engaged every day in working for the Government to earn a living; $1,800 is to be paid to them, not because they need it but because it is a promise, a promise that can not be proven, a claim for a promise that can easily be overturned by the mere reading of the acts of Congress.

But the bill will pass if it comes to a vote, I suppose. I do not see why the organizations behind the bill for the Spanish-American War widows and for the widows of deceased veterans of the Civil War who were married to them in recent years should not continue their agitation and force out of Congress the passage of bills now upon the calendar for their benefit.

Senators say, "Oh, let us pass a few less bills for rivers and harbors and for public buildings and we will pay this." Senators make much about appropriations of that kind; they take days in discussing them, holding them up to the country, and there is newspaper agitation at the same time; yet a bill can pass through here for $20,000,000, as one did last summer, and never create a word of comment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. $20,000,000 annually?

Mr. BRYAN. Annually, of course, I mean. It never creates a word of comment either in the House or in the Senate or in the press of the country, and all the money has got to be raised by taxation.

It seems to me, Mr. President, if there is any hope in an appeal to Senators upon the merits of the case, this bill can not pass.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senate on March 8, 1916, passed Senate bill 3331, amending the general dam law approved June 23, 1910, and for the improvement of navigation and development of water power in the navigable rivers of the United States with private capital. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives substituted for it a bill then pending before it for the same purpose, which, upon consideration by the House, was amended in several material particulars and passed. The Senate refused to concur in the action of the House, and the bill is now being considered by conferees appointed by the two Houses.

I am not going to discuss the differences between the bills as passed by the Senate and the House or which may be troubling the conferees, and I do not wish anything I may say to be taken as evidence that differences between the conferees exist.

There are, however, certain fundamental principles of sovereignty and jurisdiction over the navigable rivers of the United States and of property interests in their banks, beds, and waters underlying this proposed legislation which are now attracting public interest and concerning which much misinformation has been given publicity, intended to mislead the public in regard to them and the purpose and effect of the legislation, which may make some impression upon the minds of those who have not examined the questions involved with that care called for by their magnitude and importance, to which I wish to call attention.

What I have to say will be nothing new to those who are familiar with the history of the organization of our State and Federal Governments, and who know and understand the constitutional powers and limitations of the Federal Government and the reserved sovereignty, rights, and powers of the several States. The principles and authorities to which I will direct attention are elementary and known to all students of our dual form of government, and the chief merits of my remarks, if any, consist in the collation of the authorities and their application to the provisions proposed to be incorporated in the pending legislation.

The first proposition to which I will direct attention is that advanced by some that the United States has general sovereignty over the navigable rivers of the country and as sovereign holds them for all the people of the Nation as a common national resource, and that Congress has the power to arbitrarily control their banks, beds, and waters and to require the payment of rents and royalties for Federal purposes for the use of them by the riparian proprietors.

The general dam law, approved June 23, 1910, the drastic provisions of which have prohibited water-power development in navigable rivers since its enactment, and which it is the purpose of the Senate bill to repeal, as construed by some, authorizes the imposition of rents or royalties to be paid into the Federal Treasury upon all water power developed, presumably so much per horsepower, and there has been an effort to continue the authority for such charges and exactions in the pending legislation. The Senate rejected at least six amendments proposed to the Senate bill to require the payment of such charges, thus demonstrating that a majority of its Members was unalterably opposed to the principle underlying them. I believe I am authorized to say that this action was prompted by the conviction of the majority that Congress had no power to impose the payments of such rents and royalties. I believe, and will undertake to show, that all legislation of this character is unsound and unwarranted by any provision of the Constitution.

Mr. President, the United States has no general sovereignty over or property interest in navigable waters and Congress no power to legislate concerning them further than to regulate interstate and foreign commerce on them.

The several sovereign States have the exclusive and absolute sovereignty, jurisdiction, and control of such waters within their respective boundaries and hold them, their banks, beds, and waters in trust for their citizens and those to whom they have granted them in whole or in part, subject only to the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce.

These propositions will be considered together as the same authorities support both of them.

If they are sound, Congress has no power to require proprietors of lands upon navigable rivers and owners of riparian rights to pay the Federal Government royalties and charges for the use of their property; but the several States of the Union have the sole sovereignty and control over these rivers, holding them in trust for their citizens and the people of the States within whose territorial boundaries the rivers flow, and those to whom they may have been granted by the States, own and have all property rights and interests in their beds, banks, and waters, and are entitled to the enjoyment of them to the exclusion of the people of all other States subject only to the paramount use for navigation, regulated by Congress.

These propositions do not involve the power of taxation, Federal or State. The Senate bill expressly provides that the property and business of those constructing dams under it shall be subject to taxation as other property and business, and they would be subject to both Federal and State taxation, lawfully assessed and levied, without such special provision.

Nor do they controvert the power of the United States to fix rents measured by the water-power developed on public lands leased for dam sites, plants, and transmission lines in connection with water-power development, as provided in the Myers bill, now pending in the Senate. That question is not involved.

The paramount power of Congress to control navigable rivers for navigation is also conceded, the contention being that its jurisdiction is confined to measures convenient or necessary for navigation, and that charges of rents or royalties for water or water power developed have no relation to navigation.

When the thirteen original States established their independence they automatically became vested with all the sovereignty powers which the Government of Great Britain had exercised in the colonies, and among these was the sovereignty over and control of navigable streams, which in this country on account of conditions here existing, has been extended to include all streams which can be navigated for commercial purposes. These are among the reserved rights and powers of the States and are common to all of them under the constitutional principle that new States shall be admitted to the Union upon equal footing with the original States.

Mr. President, these propositions are abundantly established by an unbroken line of adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States from the earliest days of this Government down to the present.

In Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., 410), Chief Justice Taney said:

> When the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign, and in that character hold absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them for their common use, subject only to the right since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government.

In the case of Pollard, lessee, v. Hagan, (3 How., 229) the court, after quoting the above statement, said:

> Then to Alabama belong the navigable waters and soils under them in controversy in this case, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States, and no compact that might be made could diminish or enlarge these rights.

The court concludes the opinion in that case in these words:

> By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First, the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively. Secondly, the new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States. Thirdly, the right of the United States to the public lands and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land in controversy in this case.

The case of Weber v. Harbor Commissioners (18 Wall., 57–71) is to the same effect. I quote from the syllabus:

> Although the title to the soil under the tidewaters of the bay of San Francisco was acquired by the United States by cession from Mexico equally with the title to the upland, it was held only in trust for the future State. Upon the admission of California into the Union absolute property in the dominion and sovereignty over all soils under the tidewaters within its limits passed to the State, subject only to the paramount right of navigation over the waters.

These cases are approved in that of Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 381–382), where it is said:

> Such title being in the State, the lands are subjected to State regulation and control, under the condition, however, of not interfering with the regulation which may be made by Congress with regard to public navigation and commerce. The State may even dispose of the usufruct of such lands, as is frequently done by leasing oyster beds in them and granting fisheries in particular localities; also by the reclamation of submerged flats and the erection of wharves and piers and other adventitious aids of commerce. * * *
> This right of the States to regulate and control the shores of the tidewaters and the land under them is the same as that which is exercised by the Crown of England. In this country the same rule has been extended to our great navigable lakes, which are treated as inland seas; and also, in some of the States, to navigable rivers, as the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and, in Pennsylvania, to all the permanent rivers of the State; but it depends on the law of each State to what waters and to what extent this prerogative of the State over the lands under water shall be exercised. In the case of Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324) we held that it is for the several States themselves to determine this question, and that if they choose to resign to the riparian proprietor rights which properly belonged to them, in their sovereign capacity, it is not for others to raise objections.

In the great case of Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. People of Illinois (146 U. S., 387), involving the lake front in the city of Chicago, it is said:

> It is the settled law of this country that the ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by tidewaters within the limits of the several States belong to the respective States within which they are found, with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof, when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in the waters, and subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control their navigation so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States. This doctrine has been often announced by this court and is not questioned by counsel of any of the parties.

The term "tidewater," as said in the opinion, is used in the sense of navigable waters, which in this country include all navigable rivers.

And in the same case it is further said:

> The soil under navigable waters being held by the people of the State in trust for the common use and as a portion of their inherent sovereignty, any act of legislation concerning their use affects the public welfare. It is, therefore, appropriately within the exercise of the police power of the State.

In Shively v. Bowlby (162 U. S., 1–58), stating the absolute sovereignty of a State over navigable waters within its territorial boundaries, Mr. Justice Gray said:

> Each State has dealt with the lands under the tidewaters within its borders according to its own views of justice and policy, reserving its own control over such lands or granting rights therein to individuals or corporations, whether owners of the adjoining upland or not, as it considered for the best interest of the public.

The case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46–92) was brought by the State of Kansas against the State of Colorado and certain corporations organized under the laws of the latter State, to restrain them from diverting the waters of the Arkansas River for the irrigation of lands in Colorado to such an extent as to deprive the citizens of the State of Kansas of the same.

The United States filed an intervening petition, claiming the right to control the waters of the river to aid in the reclamation of arid public lands. The petition was dismissed and the reasons therefor are summed up in the syllabus of the case in these words:

> The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all the powers not granted are reserved to the people, and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State, except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over these waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State. Hence the intervening petition of the United States is dismissed without prejudice to any action which it may see fit to take in respect to the use of the water for maintaining or improving the navigability of the river.

In the opinion of the court, after a full discussion of the question, followed by the citation of many cases, page 93, it is said:

> It is useless to pursue the inquiry further in this direction. It is enough for the purposes of this case that each State has full jurisdiction over the lands within its borders, including the beds of streams and other waters.

The questions decided in that case and the one we are considering are in principle identical. The United States has no more power to control the waters of navigable rivers for the generation of power than it has to control them for irrigating the public lands, which was there denied.

In the late case of Chandler-Dunbar Co. v. United States (229 U. S., 53) Mr. Justice Lurton, for the court, said:

> The technical title to the beds of the navigable rivers of the United States is either in the States in which the rivers are situated or in the owners of the lands bordering upon such rivers. Whether in one or the other is a question of local law.

The latest deliverance of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject is to be found in the case of Long Sault Development Co. against Homer D. Call, decided December 11, 1916, and is in full accord with the cases from which I have quoted. This case was originally brought in the Supreme Court of New York and involved the constitutionality of a statute of the State of New York granting a corporation certain rights in the St. Lawrence River within that State, and upon a hearing in the Court of Appeals of the State the act was adjudged void upon the ground that the property in question was held by the State in trust for the people and could not be granted for private use. From this decree a writ of error was prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States and there dismissed for want of jurisdiction because no Federal interest or question was involved, the gist of the decision being that the banks, beds, and waters of the St. Lawrence River, a navigable stream within the State, were subject to the exclusive sovereignty and control of that State.

Mr. Justice Clark, in discussing the opinion of the Court of Appeals of New York, said:

> And then addressing itself to the constitutional problem thus stated, the court proceeds upon principle and authority to decide: That under the constitution of the State of New York the power of the legislature of that State to grant lands under navigable waters to private persons or corporations is limited to purposes which may be useful, convenient, or necessary to the public; that it has no power to so part with the title to such lands that the State may not in the future improve navigation over them if the public interest shall so require; and that they are held by the State on such a trust for the public use that the legislature has no power to authorize the conveyance of them to a private corporation to maintain navigation thereover "in as good condition as * * * at present," thereby parting for all time with its power to improve such navigation.
> The court finds its principal authority for these legal positions in the decision of this court in Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Illinois (146 U. S., 387), in which it was decided: That the title which a State holds to land under navigable waters is different in character from that which it holds in land intended for sale and occupation, in the former case it being held in trust for the people of the State in order that they may enjoy the navigation of the waters and carry on commerce over them, free from obstruction or interference by private parties; that this trust devolving upon the State in the public interest is one which can not be relinquished by a transfer of the property; that a State can no more abdicate its trust over such property, in which the whole people are interested, so as to leave it under the control of private parties, than it can abdicate its police powers in the administration of government and the preservation of peace; and that the trust under which such lands is held is governmental, so that they can not be alienated except to be used for the improvement of the public use in them.

It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the Federal Government can not grant the lands, or any interest therein, under navigable waters. Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 382), Niles v. Cedar Point Club (175 U. S., 388), Weber v. Harbor Commissioners (18 Wall., 5771). An act of Congress authorizing Indians to fish in the navigable streams of Oregon was held in the case of United States against Alaska Packers (79 F. R., 157) to be beyond the power of Congress and void.

The States not only hold all property rights in the navigable waters within their boundaries in trust for their citizens and their grantees but they may exclude the citizens of all other States from the use and enjoyment of these rights.

This was emphasized in the case of McReady v. Virginia (94 U. S., 391), which involved the validity of a statute of Virginia prohibiting the citizens of other States from planting oysters in Ware River, a navigable stream of that State. The court, after stating that "the principle has long been settled that each State owns the beds of all tidewaters within its jurisdiction, unless they have been granted away * * *, in like manner the tidewaters themselves and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running, and that for this purpose the State represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty," proceeded to hold that the banks, beds, and waters of navigable rivers within the States were the sole property of the people of those States, and that they had the right to use and enjoy them to the exclusion of the citizens of all other States, subject to the power granted to Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce on them.

The court further says, in substance, that the citizens of other States have no more right to enjoy the use of the navigable rivers of Virginia, other than for transportation purposes, than they would have had to share in the proceeds of its northwestern territory had that State sold it instead of ceding it to the Federal Government.

These principles have been written in the constitutions of many of the States, and others have declared them by statutory enactment.

The several States in the exercise of their undoubted sovereignty have long since firmly established the property rights of their people as a whole and of individuals as their grantees in the navigable waters within their boundaries, in accordance with the discretion and wisdom of each particular State. There are a number of States which have retained and held all the property rights, interests, and uses of navigable waters in trust for all of their people, and grants of them can not be made to persons or companies for private use. Among those adopting this policy are New York, Illinois, California, and Tennessee, as appears from the adjudications in the following cases: Long Sault Development Co. v. Call (Ct. Appls., N. Y.); Railroad Co. v. Illinois (146 U. S., 387); United States v. Mission Rock Co. (189 U. S., 390); Goodwin v. Thompson (83 Tenn., 209); State v. Pulp Co. (119 Tenn., 98, 99).

There are other States, perhaps a majority, which have adopted a different policy and have granted the banks, beds, and waters of their streams to persons and companies, in whole or in part, with the power to use them for domestic, agricultural, and manufacturing purposes, and property rights of various kinds and phases have thus become vested.

Whether a State will continue to hold these natural resources in trust for the whole people or will grant them, in whole or in part, to be developed and used for private purposes, and the extent and limitations upon the rights of riparian proprietors are all local matters dependent upon the constitution, laws, and policies of each of the several States, and with which the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly said the United States and Congress had no concern and no power to control.

Those States east of the Mississippi River and lying immediately west of it have adopted the common-law rule governing the rights of riparian proprietors, with more or less modification, which I will presently state. The Western States have adopted an entirely different system, known as that of "prior appropriation," made necessary by the mining and agricultural interests of that country, under which the first appropriator of the water of a stream acquires, as I understand, the right to divert it permanently and consume it in its use.

Where the common-law rule prevails the rights of riparian proprietors are limited to a reasonable use of the waters for domestic, manufacturing, and agricultural purposes, but to this extent they are as much property rights as those to the lands bordering upon the stream.

Chancellor Kent states the common law governing the rights of riparian proprietors in these words:

Every proprietor of lands on the banks of a river has, naturally, an equal right to the use of the water which flows in the stream adjacent to his lands, as it was wont to run (currere solebat), without diminution or alteration. No proprietor has the right to use the water to the prejudice of other proprietors above or below him unless he has a prior right to divert it or a title to some exclusive enjoyment. He has no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct while it passes along. Though he may use the water while it runs over his land as an incident to the land, he can not unreasonably detain it or give it another direction, and he must return it to its ordinary channel when it leaves his estate. (Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, 439.)

In Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 103) the court quotes approvingly from Chief Justice Shaw in the case of Elliott against Railroad Co. (10 Cush., 191) as follows:

The right to flowing water is now well settled to be a right incident to property in the land; it is a right publici juris, of such a character that whilst it is common and equal to all through whose land it runs, and no one can obstruct or divert it, yet, as one of the beneficial gifts of Providence, each proprietor has a right to a just and reasonable use of it as it passes through his land; and so long as it is not wholly obstructed or diverted or no larger appropriation of the water running through it is made than a just and reasonable use, it can not be said to be wrongful and injurious to a proprietor lower down. What is such a just and reasonable use may often be a difficult question depending on various circumstances. To take a quantity of water from a large running stream for agricultural or manufacturing purposes would cause no sensible or practicable diminution of the benefit to the prejudice of a lower proprietor; whereas taking the same quantity from a small running brook passing through many farms would be of great and manifest injury to those below, who need it for domestic supply or watering cattle; and therefore it would be an unreasonable use of the water, and an action would lie in the latter case and not in the former. It is therefore to a considerable extent a question of degree; still the rule is the same, that each proprietor has a right to a reasonable use of it for his own benefit, for domestic use, and for manufacturing and agricultural purposes.

The case of the United States against Chandler-Dunbar Co. is thought by some to hold that riparian proprietors have no interest in the flow of waters by and over their lands, but it does not. In the opinion of the court, page 69, it is said, "that running water in a great navigable stream is capable of private ownership is inconceivable," but it is evident that the court did not intend by this simple statement to overturn well-settled rules of property recognized by the common law for a thousand years, for on the subsequent page it is said:

That riparian owners upon public navigable rivers have in addition to the rights common to the public certain rights to the use and enjoyment of the stream, which are incident to such ownership of the bank, must be conceded. These additional rights are not dependent upon the title to the soil over which the river flows, but are incident to ownership upon the bank. Among these rights of use and enjoyment is the right, as against other riparian owners, to have the stream come to them substantially in its natural state, both in quantity and quality.

Nor does this case hold that the Federal Government can, under the commerce clause, lawfully use the waters of navigable rivers for commercial purpose in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce. The United States had acquired the fee in all riparian rights on the St. Marys River and constructed the dam upon its own property for navigation purposes, and the court merely held that the excess of power over that needed for the operation of the locks created by the dam constructed for navigation purposes might be sold.

This holding was based upon the fact that the property was taken for a public purpose—the improvement of navigation. This appears from the statement in the opinion that—

If the primary purpose is legitimate, we can see no objection to leasing an excess of water over the needs of the Government.

The case of Green Bay Canal v. Patton Paper Co. (172 U. S.) and Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay Canal Co (142 U. S.) are also relied upon to sustain the contention that the Congress may control and lease water power in navigable streams. They do not do so. The questions there decided arose upon statutory contracts, and the commerce clause of the Constitution was not involved.

I have perhaps burdened the Senate with too copious quotations from the adjudged cases upon these questions, but I desired to present in concrete form the holdings of the Supreme Court in relation to them in every period of our history. These authorities clearly and conclusively demonstrate that the United States has no general sovereignty over navigable rivers, that the people of the United States in their national character have no property interest in them, and Congress can not constitutionally exact rents or royalties, to be covered into the Federal Treasury as proposed, and that such legislation must necessarily be a usurpation of the sovereign powers of the States and confiscatory of their property and that of their citizens. Argument in support of these obvious conclusions would be an abuse of the patience of the Senate and an offense to its intelligence.

These contentions are now conceded by some of the advocates of these Federal rents and royalties who are familiar with the authorities, and they have been driven to rest the power of Congress to compel the payment of them upon the proposition, as I understand it, that the United States, through Congress, has the power to grant to the States and their grantees permits necessary to authorize them to construct dams in navigable streams, and in exercising this power may impose such conditions as Congress deems proper.

This must carry with it the assertion that this can be done, although the proposed structure will not obstruct but improve navigation, and the purpose of it be lawful and laudable, and the terms or conditions imposed are beyond the affirmative powers of Congress, and in direct violation of the express provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. President, these are most astounding propositions of constitutional law and public policy, difficult to reconcile with the spirit and genius of constitutional government and the guaranties which it affords to the personal and property rights of a free people. Is it possible that Congress can by constructive force and duress usurp the sovereign powers of the States and confiscate the property held in trust for their citizens? Can the fundamental law be thus evaded and violated to force the States and their citizens to yield to an unlawful and unjust exaction under the penalty of being arbitrarily prohibited from the use and enjoyment of their property? The premises of this proposition are fallacious. The United States has no general police power over or proprietary rights in navigable waters to grant.

The commerce clause conferring on Congress the power to regulate commerce with "foreign nations and among the States" does not authorize such legislation.

The latest judicial construction of this clause is found in the case of Adair against United States, in Two hundred and eighth United States, page 177, where it is said:

> The power to regulate interstate commerce is the power to prescribe the rules by which such commerce must be governed. Of course, as has been often said, Congress has a large discretion in the selection or choice of the means to be employed in the regulation of interstate commerce, and such discretion is not to be interfered with, except where that which is done is in plain violation of the Constitution.

And its limitations are there declared—pages 178 and 180—in these words:

> Manifestly any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce in order to be within the competency of Congress, under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. * * * We need scarcely repeat what this court has more than once said, that the power to regulate interstate commerce, great and paramount as that power is, can not be exercised in violation of any fundamental right secured by other provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. President, while the Supreme Court holds in this case that Congress has plenary power under the commerce clause to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, it also holds with equal positiveness and certainty that this power has limitations and can not be exercised in violation of other provisions of the Constitution, which is simply an application of the cardinal and fundamental principle that all the ordinances of the Constitution are of equal dignity and validity, and must be construed and enforced so as to give them all equal force and effect.

The proposed legislation would violate the tenth amendment, declaring and protecting the reserved powers of the States. The Congress would thereby usurp and assume to exercise the general police powers of the States over navigable rivers, and appropriate the property rights they hold in them in trust for their citizens.

The original States of the Union—and the new ones have the same rights—had all sovereign powers and property rights over and in navigable streams, their banks, beds, and waters within their respective boundaries before the United States was organized and the Constitution ratified, and the public then had the same easement or right of navigation it now has in those streams. Commerce, intrastate, interstate, and foreign, was regulated by the States in the exercise of their general inherent police power over navigable rivers and their waters.

All these powers and rights, except the police power conferred upon the Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, were reserved to the States, and they need no permission from Congress to exercise and control them. They exercised these powers without question by the Federal Government for a hundred years, during which time their general assemblies appropriated money for the improvement of the rivers, authorized the construction of bridges and dams, and otherwise legislated in relation to them, all of which was sustained in the principle announced in the case of Monongahela Navigation Co. against United States (148 U. S., 311), where it was held that a company authorized by the State to construct navigation dams could recover full compensation for its property when taken over by the United States under an act of Congress for the further improvement of the river. Congress did not then claim the power to interfere in such matters further than to prohibit the construction and order the removal of structures considered by it obstructions to navigation.

The statutes which Congress enacted in 1899, 1906, and 1910, which are proposed to be amended and repealed by the Senate bill, requiring the consent of Congress to the construction of dams and other structures, are not enabling acts. Congress does not thereby grant any rights to the States and riparian proprietors. These statutes and the amendment adopted by the House are prohibitory in their character and thinly disguised efforts to usurp reserved powers of the States, and appropriate for the whole Nation property rights which they hold in trust for the exclusive benefit of their own citizens.

Such legislation would also violate the fifth amendment, ordaining that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. The imposition of a charge or burden, however small, upon private property for a public purpose without compensation is confiscatory and forbidden by the fundamental law. I do not consider it necessary to cite authority to support such an obvious proposition, but the question has been directly passed upon in the cases of Rossmiller v. States (114 Wis., 169, 188); Cary Library v. Bliss (151 Mass., 364, 378); Woodward v. R. R. Co. (180 Mass., 599–603); Chicago R. R. Co. v. Illinois (200 U. S., 593).

Riparian rights are property protected by this principle. In Cyc, volume 15, page 648, it is said:

> Water rights are within the protection of the constitutional inhibition against taking or injuring private property without making just compensation to the owner. Consequently, if the waters of a lake or stream are polluted, diminished, or diverted, or otherwise taken, directly or indirectly, so as to infringe upon the rights of a riparian or littoral proprietor, or if lands lying under the waters of a lake or stream and owned by private individuals or improvements thereon are taken wholly or in part, the owner is entitled to proper compensation.

Commerce—transportation—is not the only or the highest use of navigable streams. Their waters are absolutely necessary for domestic, agricultural, and manufacturing purposes. Animal life could not be sustained and the earth would not produce food without them. These purposes and uses are all more important for the support of life and the welfare of the people of the States where the waters flow than foreign and interstate commerce and have equal protection under the Constitution.

The easement or right of navigation which the public has in navigable rivers is the same that it has in ordinary highways, and the police power which Congress, and the States within their respective jurisdictions, have to regulate it, must be exercised in a reasonable manner consistent with the rights of abutting and riparian proprietors. (Grand Rapids v. Butler, 159 U. S., 87; R. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S., 387.)

Mr. Farnham, in his valuable work on Waters and Water Rights, section 29, concerning the respective rights of the public and riparian proprietors, says:

> When it is said that the right of the public is paramount, nothing more is meant than that the riparian owner can do nothing to close the highway. He can not divert the water from the stream, nor consume it so as to defeat the possibility of navigation, nor can he place any insuperable obstructions in the stream. Conversely, the right of public navigation is not such as to destroy the rights of the riparian owner. The right can not be exercised to the unnecessary or wanton destruction of private rights or so as to deprive the riparian proprietors of the use of the stream for legitimate purposes which will not unreasonably interfere with the right of navigation. The navigation right is the right of passage merely, and so long as the right is preserved without reasonable impairment, the riparian owner may abridge the stream or use water therefrom, or even throw a dam across it, if he makes provision for the right of passage. The rights may be said to be reciprocal, each modifying the other, each to be used so as not to interfere unreasonably with the other right. The riparian owner is not bound to provide a better passage than is furnished by nature. He may even abridge the rights to some extent, if he leaves a convenient passageway.

This text is sustained by adjudged cases of last resort of many States.

It is not claimed that the absolute prohibition of the construction of all structures in streams is necessary to protect navigation, and could not be so, because it is known that the dams which companies owning riparian rights propose to construct, with locks and other facilities, would greatly improve navigation in every instance. There is no pretense that the exaction of royalties upon the waters used or the water power developed in these streams can have, in the language of Adair against United States, any "real or substantial relation or connection" with the navigation of the rivers, or that it would be a regulation of commerce. It would clearly be an unreasonable and arbitrary exercise of police power wholly foreign to commerce which could not be sustained in the courts of the country.

The case of Chicago Railroad Co. v. Illinois (200 U. S., 593) is directly in point here. It is there said:

> If the means employed have no substantial relation to the public objects which the Government may lawfully accomplish; if they are arbitrary and unreasonable beyond the necessities of the case, the judiciary will disregard mere form and interfere for the protection of rights injuriously affected by such illegal action.

The Supreme Court has held that the United States has no general police power, and Congress can not exercise that reserved to the States, although the States and their citizens give their consent. (United States v. De Witt, 9 Wall., 41; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 304; License cases, 5 How., 504; Pollard v. Hagan, 2 How., 229; In Raher, 140 U. S., 345; Enc. U. S. Repts., vol. 4, 214.)

Let us for a moment consider where the proposition that Congress can exercise general sovereignty over navigable streams and their waters, and arbitrarily prohibit the use of them would lead.

The States and their cities could be absolutely prohibited from the use of the waters and the water-power resources of the streams for any and all public purposes; and the people could be prohibited from using them for domestic, agricultural, or manufacturing purposes, regardless of the fact that in each case the use would not interfere with navigation. If one of these things can be done, all can be done. More than this, Congress could, under the guise of regulating commerce prohibit the shipment of coal, oil, and ores, without the payment of royalties by the mine owners, to be covered into the National Treasury. These are all great natural resources as much as waters and water power, and arbitrary power could as lawfully be exerted over them as a commerce regulation.

The argument made in favor of the Federal Government arbitrarily usurping the powers of the States and confiscating the rights of their citizens in navigable waters is that it is necessary to protect the people from monopoly and preserve to them this great natural resource. The history of the past shows that the Federal Government has given away more of the public property and natural resources of the country in grants of lands and subsidies to railroad companies and in grants of mining lands and lands bearing coal and oil in value many times that disposed of by all the States combined. I do not agree with the assumption that Congress and the officials of the Federal Government are more honest and more competent to manage the affairs of the States than the people of the States. Those who entertain this opinion may be right, so far as the people of their own States are concerned, but I deny that it is true of the citizens of the great State which I in part represent. I have every confidence in the integrity and ability of the people of Tennessee to administer their own affairs and protect their own interests, and for them I protest against such calumny and any interference upon the part of Congress or other Federal agencies in the free exercise of their governmental powers and private rights.

The statement has been made and given wide circulation that there is an effort by some unknown interest, vaguely spoken of as a Water-Power Trust, without the slightest evidence of the existence of such a thing, to appropriate the great natural resources of our navigable streams. There is undoubtedly an effort to appropriate these resources, but not by private interests. It is to be found in the proposed unconstitutional and confiscatory legislation, which the Senate bill proposes to repeal, and against which I am protesting, and which is nothing less than a bold and unwarranted effort to wrest from the States these valuable property interests held by them in trust for the exclusive benefit of their citizens, and appropriate them to the use of the entire Nation. The proposition is to take from the States and their people the natural resources found within their borders and turn them over to the United States to be distributed among the people of all the States.

The Senate bill fully recognizes the sovereignty of the States over navigable streams within their borders and the property rights in their waters and the interest and welfare of their citizens, and ample provisions are made to protect them all. Companies proposing to construct dams for the development of water power or other purposes are required to first obtain authority to do so from the States where the dams are to be built and the plants located and operated. The property and the business of the companies are made subject to State taxation, and the rates to be charged for the water power and hydroelectricity furnished, generated, and sold are to be regulated and fixed by the laws of the States through their public-utility commissions, and such other agencies as the States may in their discretion provide for that purpose, and special provision is made against the monopolization of waters and water power.

But if these things were not provided for it would be no concern of Congress. The Federal Government can not usurp and exercise the powers of the States, because they do not exert them in whole or in part.

The legislation which is required for the development of the water-power resources of navigable streams and all that is necessary is the repeal of the present laws arbitrarily prohibiting the States and riparian proprietors from constructing dams regardless of whether they will obstruct or improve navigation, and reasonable provisions for the submission of the location, plans, and specifications of dams proposed to be constructed, to the Federal authorities having charge of navigation in these streams, so that they may determine in advance whether the proposed structures will or will not obstruct navigation, and to require them to be constructed under plans approved by them and under their supervision, so that they will not obstruct but improve and facilitate navigation for the present and for a certain and fixed term of years, so that, so far as possible, all necessity for removal of the dam as an obstruction may be avoided.

While in the phraseology of the Senate bill the terms "permit" and "permittee" and "grant" and "grantee" are used following that of the former laws, the gist of the provisions of the bill are simply for the construction of the dams, upon the conditions and under the supervision of authorities as here stated.

This is all Congress can constitutionally legislate, because the United States has no other authority to grant and no water or water power to sell or charge royalties upon, and the States need no permit to exercise their powers further than to avoid interfering with commerce.

The provisions for the termination of the permit in the Senate bill and in the amendment of the House are substantially the same, the difference consisting largely in details and procedure. The definite term in both is 50 years. The present law provides that the term shall not exceed 50 years unless Congress shall so direct. The consensus of opinion now seems to be that a term of 50 years is necessary for properly financing a company organized for water-power development, and there is no objection to this period. The provisions of the Senate bill upon this subject are found in sections 5 and 6 of the bill.

The objections made to these provisions, as I understand them, are as follows:

It is charged that the right of the United States to take over the property under section 6 is limited to the period of the expiration of the definite term of the permit—50 years—and if not then exercised the permit becomes perpetual. This objection is unfounded. The first sentence of section 6 provides—"That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the rights hereunder granted upon the giving to the grantee, either before or after the lapse of the period of the permit, two years' notice," and after the termination of the permit the renewal or grant to another will be made as "authorized and required by then existing laws."

But if this is not sufficiently clear the bill can and will be amended, for the intention of the Senate was to reserve the right to Congress to arbitrarily terminate the permit at any time after 50 years, upon reasonable notice.

It is charged that the renewal or regrant of the permit is required to be upon the same terms as the original permit.

The lines quoted above from section 6 provide that the renewal of the permit or grant of it to another be done under "then existing laws," which may be entirely different from the requirements for the original permit prescribed in the bill and as Congress may hereafter direct.

It is charged that the permit authorized is in effect a perpetuity. This is absolutely untrue.

The permit, under section 5, is to be made for the definite term of 50 years, when it expires by limitation of law, and after that the permittee continues in the use and possession of the property, at the pleasure or option of the United States, until the permit is finally terminated by notice, when the property may be operated by the United States, granted to another permittee, or to the old permittee upon such conditions and such terms as the then existing laws, passed in the light of the experience of 50 years, may authorize and require. The provision for the continuance of the permit at the option of the United States is necessary in order that the permittee may keep the property in good repair and running order and supply his customers with power. If the permit terminated automatically and the plant shut down it would deteriorate in value and great loss would follow to all manufacturing plants dependent upon it for operative power.

Further objection is made to the provision for compensation of the permittee for his property when taken over by the United States or a new permittee. The language of section 6 upon this subject is in these words:

> Upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said property, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States. * * * In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State, no value shall be claimed or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted.

This is as far as Congress can legislate upon this subject. The provisions for taking over the property of the permittee upon the termination of the permit are in substance and effect the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and the appropriation of private property for a public purpose.

Congress has the power to determine what property is required for public use and the procedure by which it may be taken, but the compensation to be paid is a question for the courts. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, after holding that while the question of appropriation was legislative, that of the compensation was judicial, and the legislature could not prescribe the rule of compensation, quoted with approval from Isom v. Mississippi Railroad Co. (36 Miss., 300) the following statement of the law upon the subject:

The right of the legislature of the State, by law, to apply the property of the citizen to public use, and then to constitute itself the judge in its own case to determine what is the "just compensation" it ought to pay therefor, or how much benefit it has conferred upon the citizen by thus taking his property without his consent or to extinguish any part of such "compensation" by prospective conjectural advantage, or in any manner to interfere with the just powers and province of courts and juries in administering right and justice, can not for a moment be admitted or tolerated under the Constitution. If anything can be clear and undeniable upon principles of natural justice or constitutional law, it seems that this must be so.

The bill provides that the "fair value" of the property is to be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of War and the permittee, and in the event of their failure to agree, then in a proceeding in equity instituted by the United States in a district court of the United States.

The words "fair value" are synonymous with "reasonable value," used in the present law and "just compensation" used in the constitutional provision providing for the payment for property taken for public use.

The former words were selected because they were believed to express what would be just and right between the grantee and the United States or any subsequent lessee, and are ordinarily used in reference to matters here concerned. They are the words used in the Federal revenue laws providing for the valuation of property for assessment and taxation.

What is fair value must always depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case, and is a question peculiarly proper for judicial determination. The courts of the country have frequently had this question before them in determining the rights of parties in similar matters, and the meaning of the phrase "fair value" is well defined and its flexibility in application to different facts and conditions is well established, as will readily appear by reference to the adjudged cases upon the subject.

The United States Supreme Court, in the case of Wilcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. (212 U. S., 19), speaking of the valuation of the property of a company in fixing rates, said:

And we concur with the court below in holding that the value of the property is to be determined as of the time when the inquiry is made regarding the rates. If the property which legally enters into the consideration of the question of rates has increased in value since it was acquired, the company is entitled to the benefit of such increase. This, at any rate, is the general rule. We do not say that there may not possibly be an exception to it where the property may have increased so enormously in value as to render the rate permitting a reasonable return upon such increased values unjust to the public.

The same court, in the so-called Minnesota cases, involving similar questions, said:

It is clear that in ascertaining the present value we are not limited to the consideration of the amount of the actual investment. If that has been reckless or improvident, losses may be sustained which the community should not underwrite. As the company may not be protected in its actual investment if the fair value of the property be plainly less, so the making of a just return for the use of the property involves the recognition of its fair value if it be more than its cost.

In the case of Omaha v. Omaha Water Co. (218 U. S., 180) it is said:

This option to purchase excluded any value on account of unexpired franchise, but it did not limit the value to the bare bones of the plant, its physical properties, such as its lands, its machinery, its water pipes, or settling reservoirs, nor to what it would take to reproduce each of its physical features. The value in equity and justice must include whatever is contributed by the fact of the connection of the items making a complete and operating plant. The difference between a dead plant and a live one is a real value and is independent of any franchise to go on or any mere good will as between such a plant and its customers. That kind of good will, as suggested in Wilcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. (212 U. S., 19), is of little or no commercial value when the business is, as here, a natural monopoly, with which the customer must deal, whether he will or no.

There is no sound reason why the ordinary rules for ascertaining the value of property which the owner is compelled to part with by contract limitation or by law should not apply when the property of a permittee is taken over under the provisions of this bill. The same principles of justice and equity which govern controversies between individual and individual should apply to similar controversies between the sovereign and its citizens, certainly in matter affecting the private property rights of the citizen. The sovereign should not take advantage of its great power and wealth to obtain a more favorable settlement of a controversy than allowed by the law it administers in similar matters between citizen and citizen.

I have every confidence in the integrity and ability of our courts. The machinery of the courts of equity is ample and effective to ascertain all the facts and settle all equities in accordance with that common justice which should be meted out in every case. The conditions and circumstances then existing of each and every case will be considered and that which is fair and just will be done.

I do not believe that there should be specific exclusion or inclusion of values, tangible or intangible, prescribed at this time, for it is impossible to say whether they will or will not be elements of fair value at the expiration of the term of the permit. It is safer to leave these matters to be dealt with by the courts, in the light and progressive development of 50 years of experience, especially when the matter in many respects is new and the possibilities yet not fully developed and known.

The constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken but for a public use, and then only with "just compensation," can only be complied with by allowing the fair value of the property, whether it be taken over by the Government for operation or granted to another permittee. If the fair value of the property is not to be paid at the termination of the permit, it must be amortized in the rates charged during the life of the permit. There is no other way in which the capital invested can be returned, because the rates charged would otherwise be confined to a fair return upon the investment. There is no way to compel those who have money to invest it in water-power development.

The business requires large capital, is new and not fully understood, and hazardous from floods and many other natural causes. If investments of this kind are not protected as other property interests these vast natural resources will continue to go to waste and the country deprived of the beneficent use of cheap power. There is nothing immoral or unlawful in the development of water power that investors in it should be discriminated against and penalized.

The chief object of legislation of this character should always be to advance the interest of the consumers of water power and hydroelectric energy, and this has been the controlling purpose in framing the Senate bill. There are few who do not concede that rents, royalties, or charges which may be imposed upon water-power development by the Federal Government, and all deductions made from the fair value of the property when taken over or regranted to another upon the expiration of the permit, must be taken into consideration by public-service commissions fixing and regulating the rates to be charged for the power sold, and thus in the end will be paid by the people.

A provision requiring the permittee to take less than the fair value of his property would be only another method of collecting rent and royalties for the benefit of the Federal Government from property in which it has no possible proprietary interest and is subject to the same constitutional objections. There is no difference in requiring the contribution to be paid in advance in royalties and at the expiration of the permit by deductions from the value of the property. It is in either form a taking of private property without just compensation. The permit passes no property interest and is not a valuable consideration. It is a mere police permit allowing the owner to use his property in a lawful manner.

The conception which obtained publicity and prominence about 10 years ago—that a great Federal revenue should in this way be raised, to the prejudice of the rights of the sovereign States and their citizens—has been largely abandoned, and especially by many officials whose duties required them to study water-power development and prominent disinterested citizens who have given the matter attention. It is believed by them that prompt development of the water-power resources of this country for the benefit directly of the inhabitants of the district where they are found and indirectly in forwarding the interests of all the people in cheap power should not be retarded by a policy of doubtful propriety, justice, and constitutionality when viewed in its most favorable light.

Mr. Fisher, former Secretary of the Interior, in the hearings on the development and control of water power before the National Waterways Commission, said:

I should put it in the statute—

Referring to the term—

50 years—not more than 50 years—as the term of a grant. I do not think it is necessary to have a longer period, and I do not think any engineer or promoter interested cares for it beyond that length of time.

He must take care of his finances in most cases within a shorter period than that. If you do not gant him a renewal, you must take care of the capital invested in the plant. You must follow one of two principles—you have either got to say that this concern can charge during a particular period of the grant a rate which will enable it to retire the principal or you must provide that you will protect the principal as it stands at the end of the grant. You may prefer that the grantee shall turn over the investment at the end of the grant to the public for nothing. I can not understand that policy. That means the people living during the 50-year period are going to have to pay for the entire investment and that posterity will get it for nothing. But if you think posterity should share the burden with us, and I am personally inclined that way, I would be in favor of saying, "You provide adequate funds for depreciation, renewals, and obsolescence and we will take your plant over at the end of the period at the then value of the plant if you do not continue."

I will also read a statement from the preliminary report of the United States National Waterways Commission, made by Senator Theodore E. Burton, as chairman, and Senators Jacob H. Gallinger, William Alden Smith, F. M. Simmons, James P. Clarke, and Representatives Stephen M. Sparkman, John A. Moon, and others, page 24:

The commission is of the opinion that the Federal Government has no proprietary right or interest in navigable waters which would authorize the collection of tolls. The right, if it exists at all, rests upon either the second or third theory stated. As regards the second theory, it should be said that the imposition of tolls, unless based upon a more substantial foundation than the mere authority to grant or withhold consent—an authority arising solely from the control of the Federal Government for the purposes of navigation—does not commend itself to the commission, and it is to be doubted whether, even in case a bill should be passed or other action taken by Congress for granting this permission, with a provision for charging tolls, such tolls could be collected. Regarding the third theory stated, it should be noted that under the exercise of the taxing power Congress can levy taxes for general revenue purposes upon all classes of water power, whether in navigable or nonnavigable streams, and if charges are to be imposed it would seem that this is the normal method. It should further be borne in mind that a requirement for the imposition of tolls where the right to construct a dam is hereafter granted would cause a discrimination between water power to be utilized under future permits and those already enjoyed, which are subject to no such charge. It must, of course, be remembered that whenever the privilege of constructing dams is granted in a navigable stream there is an undoubted right to impose charges sufficient to pay the expenses of examination and supervision and to secure the Government against cost, by reason of obstacles to navigation created by the erection of dams, but this rests upon an entirely different principle from the proposal to charge tolls.

Mr. President, there is another feature of this legislation to

The conditions and terms upon which the persons and companies owning or acquiring riparian rights upon navigable rivers, complying with the laws of the States concerning such matters, to construct dams in them, first having obtained a permit to do so from the Secretary of War upon the terms prescribed in the bill, and those which it authorizes that officer to impose. This is necessary for a workable law.

The conditions and terms upon which the persons and companies may be authorized to construct dams or other obstructions in navigable streams are proper subjects of legislation, and should be prescribed by the Congress, but the mere location of a dam in accordance with such legislation is a matter of administrative detail which the War Department, having charge of the improvement of navigable rivers, can best investigate and determine, so as to protect fully the interest of navigation.

The construction of dams is a local matter, and for more than a century Congress left the control of it entirely to the States wherein the rivers were situated, and no other permit was required than that of the general assembly of the State, the structure, subject always to be removed if deemed by the Federal authorities an obstruction to navigation. This contingency was sufficient to prevent interference with navigation by structures, and there was no friction between the Federal Government and the States, or those to whom they granted permits, concerning dams in navigable streams.

The Congress, by an act passed in 1899, forbade all structures without a special act giving its consent. Why this change was made and this great burden of administrative detail assumed by Congress does not appear. Nor does it appear that there was any special demand for the legislation, nor that the question was debated, nor that it received deliberate consideration when the law was passed.

A general dam law which requires the action of Congress in each separate project is one in name only. It is not within the power of this nor any future Congress to control the legislative policy of their successors. Congresses are constantly changing membership, and new Members will always have different views concerning the improvement of navigation and water-power development which would be written in each separate act consenting to a particular project, and this would absolutely destroy uniformity in legislation of this kind and assure discrimination and inequality in the terms of different permits.

The delays which occur in procuring the consent of Congress by special acts and the uncertainty of what the provisions of such acts will be, have in the past discouraged capital and caused it to seek other investments free from such embarrassments, and will continue to do so. The Congress has conferred upon the War Department jurisdiction over navigable rivers and intrusted to its officers the improvement of them with appropriations from the Public Treasury, with full discretion in the location and construction of dams, locks, and other facilities for navigation, and there is no valid reason why these same officers should not be intrusted with this discretion when private capital is used in making improvements. Congress, before enacting special acts for this purpose, has generally referred them to the War Department for a report, so far as the project affected navigation, and has given great weight to such reports. This provision does not carry with it any appropriation from the Federal Treasury or concession of public property, but is a delegation of part of the police power of Congress to regulate commerce by the improvement of navigable rivers. I think it is now generally conceded that this plan is preferable to special acts authorizing the construction of dams. Authority to grant permits for water-power development upon the public domain has been given the Secretary of the Interior and found to operate satisfactorily. The police power has also been conferred upon other departments of the Government over matters within their respective jurisdictions with satisfactory results.

Mr. President, the navigable rivers of the United States are perhaps the greatest natural resources of our country. We have about 50,000 miles of these rivers which are navigable for commercial purposes, and about one-half of them have obstructions, such as falls, rapids, and shoals, which must be removed or submerged.

The maximum water-power horsepower in the United States is estimated to be 61,780,000, exclusive of available storage, only about one-tenth of which is developed and utilized. That in the navigable rivers alone is estimated to be about 27,000,000 horsepower, of which a comparatively small portion is developed. Our present arbitrary and oppressive laws controlling these rivers have absolutely prohibited and strangled water-power development in them, the total development since they were enacted being less than 140,000 horsepower. There never was a time in the history of this country when the necessity for improving the navigation in these streams and utilizing this natural energy now going to waste was greater than at present. Our magnificent railroad systems—and we have the greatest in the world—have utterly failed to answer the demands of the commerce of the country, and transportation has been congested for months. The further construction of railroads to any important extent seems improbable, as the mileage in the last two years has been less than that of any one year for half a century. The opening of our rivers for navigation has become an imperative necessity, but the Government is embarrassed in accomplishing it because of the great expense required.

We must have cheap power in large quantities for manufacturing fertilizers, steel, chemicals, aluminum, and many other things necessary to the cultivation of our lands and to enable us to compete with other countries in the production of those articles. The cost of foodstuffs of all kinds has reached a mark that is oppressive to a large part of the people of the country, resulting from diminished supply and increased population. Our lands have deteriorated in fertility and must be fertilized to make them produce larger crops. We must have cheaper nitrogen and phosphorus for the manufacture of fertilizers, which are only obtainable by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen and electrical treatment of phosphate rock. We can not obtain the hydroelectricity for these purposes without the development of our water powers.

The capital to open these rivers for transportation and develop and utilize this energy can be obtained by repealing the present prohibitory statutes and enacting proper laws which will safeguard and protect the property of the investors, at the same time affording ample protection to the rights of the people in these great natural resources. It is unjust to the American people to longer delay legislation of this kind; indeed, it seems to me little less than a crime that we should arbitrarily prohibit the development of our rivers for these beneficent purposes, which would contribute so much to the happiness and prosperity of our people. The time for personal exploitation, publicity, and false conservation has passed and practical methods and policies ought to be adopted and followed.

Mr. President, some time ago Mr. Hugh L. Cooper, a well-known hydraulic engineer, whose best known work is the great hydroelectric plant on the Mississippi River at Keokuk, Iowa, in an article on water-power development appearing in the Outlook, said:

It is stated by some of those who oppose changing the present laws for the development of water power on public lands that there is no necessity of demand for additional developments in the West, because some existing power companies have sufficient power unsold to supply the present and near-future market. This suggestion by Government officials that great areas of territory in the West and South shall be deprived of industrial growth through water-power assistance until these few restricted districts have consumed all their developed power is so unfair and unsound economically as to be almost pitiful. Our railways had to overdevelop that the country might develop, and the same is true of the water-power industry. It can also be said that in the entire United States to-day there is not a single water power developed that can offer power terms justifying the establishment of fertilizer works, electrochemical works, large irrigation projects, or nitrogen-fixation plants. It can also be said that there are now tentatively under serious consideration in the United States new developments that will call for more than $75,000,000, all awaiting for encouraging legislation only. Must our unnecessary importations, amounting to $50,000,000, and many other crying needs, wait until a few western plants can sell out a small amount of power now unsold? I do not think the people will take kindly to this idea. Furthermore, if it should turn out in the future that more power is developed than can be immediately sold, such a condition is hardly one which the public or the Government need worry about, so long as the people reserve to themselves the right to regulate power rates.

What facts Mr. Cooper had to base these statements upon I do not know, but from his well-known character it is supposed that he would know whereof he speaks. There is unquestionably great opposition to the free development of the water-power resources in the United States, but whether it comes from a combination of the water-power-developed interests, from the great transportation companies of the country who would be prejudiced by navigation upon our waterways, or from other sources, I do not know.

I have referred to the strenuous efforts that have been made to impose burdens upon water power yet to be developed, and the fact that this would be a discrimination against them because the companies having plants in operation are not subject to such charges. There is a constitutional and a just method by which all persons and companies engaged in water-power development may be required to contribute to the expenses of the National Government, and that is by an excise tax. I have been opposed to a tax of this kind, because one of the great objects of water-power development is to furnish cheap energy necessary for the purposes I have just stated, and every burden imposed will find a place in the rates charged the people for the use of the power. But if charges upon water-power development must be imposed it should be done in a lawful manner, and therefore I will propose an amendment to the bill for the increase of revenue when it comes to the Senate providing for such a tax in these words:

That all persons, associations, and corporations engaged in the business of operating plants for the production of water power shall pay an excise tax of 10 cents per horsepower year of energy produced and used or sold or otherwise disposed of.

All persons, associations, and corporations subject to this tax shall annually file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on January 1 of each year, a detailed statement of the horsepower produced, sold, used, or otherwise disposed of by them for the previous year, duly verified by a person having knowledge of the facts: Provided, That this tax shall not apply to any person, association, or corporation during the five years next after having begun the business of producing, using, selling, or disposing of water power, nor to persons, associations, or corporations producing, using, or selling less than 100 horsepower: Provided further, That no person or company required by the terms of the permit granted to them by Congress, or any authorized agent of the United States, to construct a dam or dams in navigable streams for the development of water power to pay any rent, royalty, or charge of any nature, or of any amount, shall be subject to the said tax, and no such royalty or charge shall exceed the tax hereby levied.

The rate is suggestive and tentative. If thought best, it can be raised. A tax levied in this way will discriminate against neither existing nor future water-power companies and will be fair to all of them.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not one of those guilty of the charge that an effort has been made to prevent action upon the bill under consideration in order to defeat it. I regret that my sense of duty to the American people renders it impossible for me to support this measure, but I am perfectly willing to have a vote upon it. I am willing that the sense of the Senate may be taken upon it, and if a majority of the Senate and the Congress approve it I am willing for it to become a law.

It is an extraordinary measure, one that has grown out of the peculiar conditions of the time. The world is mad on the subject of war. The military is rapidly gaining ascendency in the mind of the people over the civil. The dangers against which we were warned by the far-seeing, patriotic Jefferson in the morning of our national life confront us ere the noon hour of our career is reached. The truths taught by the fathers that we have held sacred and cherished as the quintessence of human wisdom for all these years are cast aside as mere vaporings, verbal rubbish, wholly inapplicable to present conditions, and insufficient to meet the imaginary demands of the present or the immediate future.

Somebody has wisely said that one of the most striking things that history teaches is the unmindfulness of what was taking place on the part of those who were prominent actors in what has proven to be the great turning points of time. I do not believe the most prescient, far-seeing statesman in America to-day accurately measures the meaning and the real tendency of things. The greed for gain, the princely profits which the manufacturers of munitions of war have received, overbalance all matters of patriotic consideration. Money mad, the Alexanders of finance of the present are looking out for new worlds to conquer. A great army and a large navy will be needed to hold the oppressed in order when the oppressor demands an unfair share of the products of the laborers' toils. The fevered state of the public mind is taken advantage of. The old landmarks are torn down, and an entirely new order of things is at hand. Everything must be done to make the military life attractive to the young men, and the products of honest toil which should be devoted to education and other peaceful enterprises must be used to build up the Army. Regular Army officers, generals of high rank whose very life work inspires a contempt for free institutions, are being drafted to write bills for Congress to enact. Compulsory military training and service are to be given prominence in our legislative program that an Army may be built up to serve the purpose which armies always serve. I am not a pessimist, but as I dip into the future there appears to my mind's eye above the horizon an ominous cloud which presages disaster to free government.

It is time to pause, to take counsel of our better judgment, study the lessons of the past, and from the wisdom of the ancients learns the way around the snares and pitfalls which imperil our pathway in the immediate future. The only light we have to guide us in the darkness of the future is that which shines out from the experiences of the past. Time and experience have proven beyond any sort of doubt that if the Nation, like the individual, shall sow to the wind it will reap the whirlwind. If we sow the seed of militarism, we shall inevitably, there is no doubt about it, reap despotism. Free institutions can not live if they must be defended by the professional soldier. And the experiences of mankind have demonstrated that great armies and navies are utterly inconsistent with free institutions.

Mr. President, I honor the man, I care not what his vocation may be or in whatever walks of life his footsteps may fall, who promptly answers the demands of duty and hesitates not in the performance thereof to count the cost, and who refuses at all times to measure with gold the value of service or the consequences of his heroic acts. I cheerfully acknowledge the Nation's indebtedness to the brave men who wore the blue in that fateful conflict waged more than a half century ago, which submerged our fair land with woman's tears and painted crimson the hills and valleys of our common country with the sacred blood of brothers. Their heroism is a common heritage which every worthy American, without regard to section, holds sacred—the priceless jewel of our citizenship. We may differ as to the constitutionality of their cause, we may dispute as to whether the consequences of their act will bring ultimately good or evil to the people, but there can be no justifiable disputation touching the exalted purposes and high sense of duty which inspired them in making the almost superhuman sacrifice in that unfortunate struggle. If there be one among that gallant band living to-day who finds the shadow of the evening of his life deepened by the appalling clouds of poverty, let his wants be made known to this body, and I shall crave the opportunity to cast the first vote for the measure that will take from the National Treasury ample funds to supply his necessities and dispel forever from his patriotic soul every disquieting apprehension of poverty. And I shall vote to give it to him not as a charity, not as alms, but rather in payment of the Nation's obligations to him. Mr. President, in the realm of patriotism there is no aristocracy of rank, no higher or lower order of service, but rather that perfect democracy which disregards shoulder straps and measures the value of the man and the Nation's obligation to him by the lofty purposes which animated his patriotic soul and glorified his service to his country. The pension roll of this Republic should be a roll of honor, which should evidence the regard and admiration in which the people of the Nation hold the man who faltered not when duty called him to his country's service; and that roll should be guarded against the unworthy who would seek to prostitute patriotism for pelf or personal aggrandizement. Every element of greed, every idea of commercialism should be eliminated.

The volunteer soldier who took up arms in defense of his country is entitled to support and maintenance at the hands of his Government upon one theory only, and that is that age, misfortune, or the accidents of war have rendered him incapable of supporting himself. He did not serve his country in those days "that tried men's souls" for pelf or the paltry pay of the professional soldier in time of peace, but rather from a sense of duty which impells every man to defend his home and fulfill, without hope of reward or fear of punishment, the obligations which every good citizen acknowledges to his country. The very thought of commercializing patriotism, or measuring a man's service to his country in time of war by money, is repulsive to my every idea of the citizen's duty to his Government. Mr. President, it was once my fortune to be called upon to do a citizen's duty and take up arms in defense of this Nation's flag, and while the war in which I served was an insignificant affair compared with that desperate struggle in which the beneficiaries of this proposed bill engaged, yet the spirit which moved me and my comrades was identical with the spirit that prompted the veterans on either side in the War between the States. If this bill shall pass, it will only be a little while, I fear, before the officers of the Spanish-American War will be knocking at the doors of Congress and asking that they, too, be placed on the retired list, with pensions similar to those enjoyed by the Regular Army officers. Then, where, in the name of truth, will it all end? Who will bear the burden of this enormous expense, the magnitude of which is appalling to those who must pay it? I trust that the officers of the Spanish-American War may never ask for this favor.

Mr. STONE. I wish the Senator would make it clear that that is the war in which he enlisted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; I am doing that. They are not entitled to it, and it should not be granted them, but if this precedent shall be established I am quite sure that they will ask for it, and in the course of time it will be granted. The men of the Spanish War are quite as human—cumbered with all the frailties—greed, cupidity, ambition, patriotism, and selfishness—which characterize the men of other wars. Now, the man who stood with me in the ranks, and suffered all the hardships, dangers, and trials of army life, is entitled to just as much from the National Treasury for support in the hours of adversity or in the twilight of incompetent old age as I, who commanded him in the service. It matters not what others may think or say, I want to announce in this presence to-day that I should feel guilty of commercializing the patriotism which prompted me to enlist in that service if I should ask any especial favor because of my service as an officer in that war and deny to my comrades in the ranks the same measure of pay, in the way of a pension, which I claim for myself.

The pension roll is becoming a great burden on the taxpayers. I am afraid it contains some names that ought not to be there—the names of men more able to support themselves than many who are taxed for their support. The military expenses of this Government are weighing heavily upon the aching stoop of the men who toil. The spirit of greed is eating out the hearts of some of our people—vitiating the pure, patriotic blood of citizenship. Pretended love of country is being capitalized, and unless something shall be done to call a halt the spirit of love for his country, which should glorify the heart of every citizen, will give away to a sense of resentment on the part of the laboring people, whose toil and sacrifice and suffering support the favored few, and upon whom this particular burden will fall. I have great respect and reverence for the volunteer officers on the Federal side in the War between the States, and I stand ready at all times to show my respect and honor for their heroic past, but I also have respect, love, and some consideration for the slow-thinking, patient, long-suffering toiler whose interest seems to have been forgotten in the consideration of this measure. Therefore I can not consistently, with my sense of obligation to the American people, support this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably from the Committee on Public Lands Senate bill 6854, relating to the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I shall have to object at this time, not that I am opposed to the report, but the Senator having the volunteer officers' retired list bill in charge has taken the position that no report of a committee should be presented until a vote has been had on the pending question.

Mr. THOMAS. I was not ready to submit the report this morning at the proper time.

Mr. SMOOT. I want the Senator to know that I have no personal objection to the report being made.

Mr. THOMAS. Very good; I withdraw the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 9, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 8, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Imbue us plenteously, O Lord God of Hosts, with heavenly gifts, that we may control our thoughts, direct our ways, and possess our souls in patience through the deliberations of this, another congressional day, and accord to others here and elsewhere the same rights we desire for ourselves with perfect urbanity; that the genius of our Republic may be fulfilled, and peace and happiness may obtain throughout our borders, now and forevermore. In the spirit of the Master, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 6, 1917, was read and approved.

JOINT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. ADAMSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 190, reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, entitled "Joint resolution to continue and extend the time for making report of the joint subcommittee appointed under a joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee,' approved July 20, 1916, and providing for the filling of vacancies in said subcommittee."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 190. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the resolution provides.

Mr. RAYBURN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 191. Joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to provide the postmaster at St. Paul, Minn., with a special canceling die for the winter sports carnival of that city; and

S. 7556. An act to grant to the Mahoning & Shenango Railway & Light Co., its successors and assigns, the right to construct, complete, maintain, and operate a combination dam and bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River, near the borough of Lowellville, in the county of Mahoning and State of Ohio.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 191. Joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to provide the postmaster at St. Paul, Minn., with a special canceling die for the winter sports carnival of that city; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

An act (S. 7556) to grant to the Mahoning & Shenango Railway & Light Co., its successors and assigns, the right to construct, complete, maintain, and operate a combination dam and bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River, near the borough of Lowellville, in the county of Mahoning and State of Ohio; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SHERWOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. SHERWOOD. To ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Ohio State Journal 3 inches in length and an eight-line editorial from the State Journal, of Topeka, Kans.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a couple of editorials, one from a Topeka (Kans.) paper and the other from a Columbus (Ohio) paper. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the editorials referred to:

[Editorial from Ohio State Journal, Jan. 1, 1917.]

ON ANOTHER'S BEAT.

In reference to the testimony of Gen. Scott, Chief of Staff, before the Senate committee, in which he said this country needed 3,000,000 trained men to be ready for future wars, the thoughtful and dignified New Republic said of the general: "He may be a good soldier, but he should be forbidden in the future to disclose in public the mischievous folly of his political opinions." And, further, that paper adds, "Let us thank God we are still governed by civilians." The same remark might refer to Gen. Wood, who makes every effort possible to appear as a statesman when his business is entirely foreign to that. As soon as a general goes to dabbling in politics he should be court-martialed. It is hard for some people to discriminate on matters of this kind, but the difference is as wide as a river. A general deals with army formation and drill, and not with legislation and policies, and he should be taught the distinction at West Point.

[From the Topeka (Kans.) State Journal.]

NOT THE MILITIA.

One might almost suppose Gens. Wood and Scott, who testify so glibly to the failure of the militia, never heard that it was the Thirteenth Regular Cavalry that Villa caught asleep at Columbus, N. Mex. Neither was it militia officers that led the troopers of the Tenth Cavalry into the ambush at Carrizal.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONRY] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, with Mr. CONRY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the item on page 64, lines 10 to 13, for the purpose of offering the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to page 64, line 10, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, let us see what it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 64, at the end of line 13, by inserting the following: "The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the leasing of modern fireproof buildings for the use of the Department of Agriculture for a period not to exceed five years, renewable at the option of the Government for a period not to exceed five years at annual rentals not to exceed the amount herein appropriated and at a rate per annum per square foot of available floor space not to exceed 34 cents."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to page 64 for the purpose of offering the amendment as read by the Clerk. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that items of that character are usually carried in what are called "miscellaneous" items, a little further on in the bill, and I do not think it is necessary to return to page 64.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill we carry legislation of this character following the item providing for rent, and I think it is proper to insert it right here, because it refers to the amount that is carried in this item, that "he is authorized to enter into contracts to an amount not to exceed the amount herein appropriated." I think it is more appropriate to insert it here than in the item referred to by the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Where is it appropriate to insert it?

Mr. STAFFORD. On page 64, lines 10 to 13.

Mr. LEVER. Would not my colleague be willing to defer that until my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] looks into it? He is familiar with the details.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am willing to do that. I will withdraw it for the time being, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Wisconsin temporarily withdraws his amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collecting and distributing, by telegraph, mail, and otherwise, timely information on the supply, commercial movement, disposition, and market prices of fruits and vegetables, $184,740, of which sum $40,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Particularly as to that clause which makes the amount of $40,000 immediately available. Last year we made an appropriation for the work of this bureau of $136,000, and I rise to ask about the necessity of an additional $40,000 to be made immediately available.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman understands that under this item the department is undertaking to furnish information to producers and consumers with respect to the volume of certain perishable products, vegetables, potatoes, and the like. It has come to our attention that the amount recommended last year was not entirely sufficient to enable them to open their work early this spring in time to take care of the movement of some crops, like strawberries and the earier maturing vegetables, and they thought that to make this amount immediately available would very materially increase the value of that service. It is for that reason that we allowed it.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLIER. I want to say that the work done on this line has been attended with the most marked success and is very gratifying.

Mr. LEVER. The information before the committee is that the work under this item has more than justified the hopes of the committee and the hopes of the department itself; and if we can go along conservatively and wisely, without asking the department to do too much, we ought to establish a very splendid piece of machinery for the marketing of these very perishable products.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hardly understand the mathematics of the committee in this and other items, where they make available a large portion of the appropriation for the remainder of the present fiscal year. There has been appropriated for this item $136,000 for the present fiscal year, and you intend to increase that by this $40,000 item, making it $176,000. Subtract the $40,000 from the total of $184,000 appropriated in this item, and it will make only $144,000 available for the next fiscal year. So there will be $176,000 available for expenditure this fiscal year and only $144,000 available for expenditure in the next fiscal year.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true. What we are trying to do here, in effect, is practically to change the beginning of the year on this particular item, and we have got to make up for the gap somewhere. Does the gentleman catch my point? For example, we have found that in the appropriation of the amount carried in the current law we have not enough money available for taking advantage of the movement of these perishables early in the spring. Therefore it is in a degree a deficiency; but if we appropriate $40,000 and make it immediately available, that will carry us next year to the same point, and we shall begin there and will not need any deficiency appropriation for the next year. We are trying to get this appropriation so that it will cover the entire year. As it is now, there is a gap somewhere that we are trying to fill up.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is certainly novel and may be explicable to the wonderful intellect of the gentleman from South Carolina, but it is rather dark and vague and hidden to me.

Mr. LEVER. Perhaps I have not made myself entirely clear.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as there is another committee that has jurisdiction over deficiency appropriations, I feel constrained to make the point of order to the language in lines 6 and 7—

Of which sum $40,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to gather from stockmen, live-stock associations, State live-stock and agricultural boards, common carriers, stockyards, commission firms, live-stock exchanges, slaughtering and meat-packing companies, and others information relative to the number of different classes and grades of marketable live stock, especially cattle, hogs, and sheep in the principal live-stock feeding districts and growing sections; prices, receipts, and shipments of the different classes and grades of cattle, hogs, and sheep at live-stock market centers; prices of meats and meat food products and the amounts of such products in storage; to compile and publish such information at such frequent intervals as most effectively to guide producers, consumers, and distributors in the sale and purchase of live stock, meats, and other animal products; and to gather and publish any related information pertaining to marketing and distribution of live stock, meats, and animal by-products, the sum of $66,800.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Amend, on page 75, after line 25, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"To make investigation relating to the production, transportation, storage, preparation, marketing, manufacture, and distribution of agricultural food products, including the extent, manner, and methods of any manipulation of the markets or control of the visible supply of such food products, or any of them, by any individuals, groups, associations, combinations, or corporations, $50,000."

Mr. LEVER. I reserve a point of order on that. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer it as a new paragraph?

Mr. MANN. As a new paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. I should like to hear the gentleman's statement on that, please.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a general desire that there shall be an investigation along these lines. I think the Bureau of Markets of the Agricultural Department is qualified to make it more economically and more efficiently than any other bureau or branch of the Government service. It is right in line with the work that that bureau is doing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the gentleman's idea that this investigational work as to the monopolizing of the market by cornering foodstuffs can be better undertaken by the Department of Agriculture than by the Department of Justice? I suppose we are all in sympathy with the main purpose of the gentleman's amendment, and perhaps if we can not get the fullest results from the Department of Justice there can be no objection to investing authority in the Department of Agriculture, if any good can result from the investigation of the hold-up of commodities.

Mr. MANN. Of course the Bureau of Markets is best qualified to make the examination and investigation. If it should obtain information which ought to be turned over to the Department of Justice, I take it that would be done.

Mr. DOWELL. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if with this further investigation it will be necessary to increase this appropriation?

Mr. MANN. I have provided for an appropriation of $50,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been a long time coming, but is it not a fact that the Department of Justice has begun an investigation into the high cost of living?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I suppose they are continually making some investigations in the Department of Justice, but the Bureau of Markets are dealing with these questions all the time, and can more easily obtain the information than anyone else.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion around me that I can not hear a word of what gentlemen are saying, and this is a very important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a very important matter. If I am not mistaken, the district attorney at Boston has been assigned by the Attorney General to make an inquiry as to the reason for the high cost of living, and he has submitted a report—perhaps a partial report—indicating that delays in shipment are very largely accountable for the increase in the cost of living, and that the holding up of cars in particular has much to do with the increase in the price of coal and much to do also with the increase in the price of foodstuffs that are held in cars.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that that is the case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's idea is that there should be an independent inquiry in the Department of Agriculture through the Bureau of Markets, which may lead to information that may be transmitted to the Attorney General if it is found to come within the purview of that department?

Mr. MANN. Well, if there is manipulation, yes; but the Bureau of Markets is qualified to make an investigation along the lines that it is now pursuing, not only to ascertain whether there should be a criminal prosecution but also to ascertain how to remove the evils that now exist that add very much to the cost of living.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose, except that it occurs to me that if another investigation is to be had without any compelling power, in the event of anything being discovered as to the cause of the high cost of living, we would be duplicating work and getting nowhere.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to make the suggestion that the investigation being made by the Department of Justice is limited in two regards: First, to an investigation as to whether or not the law already in existence has been violated, and, second, the question as to whether the law has been violated in a particular place under the jurisdiction of some particular district attorney in some city. The investigations that are made by the Department of Agriculture will be general in their nature, and it will recommend, if necessary, whether or not new law may not be required or amendments to the existing law. An investigation will not be limited to a particular locality, but extended to all principal markets in the United States. In my judgment it is very important that the Department of Agriculture should make the investigation.

Mr. LEVER. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if he regards this proposition as likely to be a continuing appropriation—that is, for more than one or two years?

Mr. MANN. I do not know how long it would take.

Mr. LEVER. It would take 12 months at least, or 2 years, because the gentleman's proposition involves a broad inquiry into the economics of the situation.

Mr. MANN. In bringing the production to the consumption in the most economical manner.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of complaint about the shortage of car service. Does the gentleman from Illinois construe his amendment to hold that the department shall go into an investigation of that subject and ascertain the cause and recommend a remedy for the shortage of car service?

Mr. MANN. Probably not; but still they might make suggestions as to the shortage of car service in certain matters. Of course, the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction with reference to the shortage of car service. The Bureau of Markets now makes recommendation in order to supply the market at particular places and particular seasons as to the transportation of commodities, and it is doing effective service.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, after consulting with my colleagues on the committee, I shall not make the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. If there be anything that is overdone, it is investigations. The Department of Justice, the health officials in the State of Illinois, and in Chicago are making investigations, the State authorities in Massachusetts are making investigations, the municipal authorities in New York are making investigations. It is provided in a resolution that has been reported from the Judiciary Committee that the Federal Trade Commission shall conduct an investigation, to take 18 months, at a cost of $142,000.

I saw recently a statement made by Mr. Barnes, a member of Parliament, on the 17th day of October, in a debate on the high cost of food in Great Britain. He made the statement that nothing had so angered the people of Great Britain during the past two years as the profit made from foodstuffs consumed by the people except it was the shameless excuses put forth for it by officials of the Government. I believe that statement applies to the situation in this country, except that I would add that nothing has angered them so much as the profit made on foodstuffs except the excuses offered by officials of the Government, and the apparent absolute incapacity and inability of any instrumentality of the Government to cope with the situation.

I have watched the result of numerous investigations conducted by various services by the Federal Government. Ninety-nine per cent of them have resulted in a waste of the expenditure, and without the accomplishment of any beneficial result. I am unwilling to be put in the attitude of saying that the only thing Congress can do for the relief of the present condition is to authorize somebody to conduct an investigation.

There are a number of well-known causes for existing conditions that can be relieved by legislation. I believe that instead of investigating we ought to act, and act in an emphatic manner. I shall not consent to authorize the Bureau of Markets to start with an initial appropriation, an annual expenditure of $50,000, to make an investigation that will never end and will continually grow without any beneficial results from the expenditure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with very much that the gentleman from New York has said, but this is a practical method; for the Bureau of Markets can practically aid in economizing in the movement of the food products from the producer to the consumer; not merely for criminal prosecution but giving practical aid. I think anyone must know, and all of those who are engaged in business will admit, that there is a very great lack of economy in the handling and passage of food products from the farm to the home consumption. The very purpose of this is to be a practical and not merely a theoretical investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why can not some department make some inquiry and some recommendation without large additional expenditures of money?

Mr. MANN. The Bureau of Markets is doing a lot of good work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have the organization, they have the equipment, but whenever it is suggested that they can serve or give aid in any way, they always press the necessity of being permitted to spend a lot of money. They ought to be familiar with conditions in this country about production and the marketing of foodstuffs, and if they have information of value they ought to be able to make a recommendation without the appropriation of $50,000, which I know from my experience will grow into an exceedingly large appropriation without any possible benefit as the result of it.

Mr. MANN. I think there will be very great compensating benefits. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order; yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order, Mr. Chairman. Under the act creating the Department of Agriculture there are authorized appropriations for any matter relating to agriculture or horticulture, in the broadest sense. That covers transportation of the agricultural products. All the items in this bill have been held in order under that provision of the organic act.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Every amendment proposed to the Agricultural bill is not in order. In order to have this amendment held in order the gentleman must submit the law authorizing the expenditure for the work.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all. The law authorizing the expenditure for work——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; the burden is upon the gentleman proposing the amendment to produce the law which authorizes the expenditure.

Mr. MANN. I have produced the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection of the organic act of the Department of Agriculture is that it does not in any way, construing it in the most liberal manner, justify any such expenditure as the proposed one. This is not in the interest of agriculture or of horticulture. It is not intended to be in the interest of either. The purpose is to make investigations upon the theory that the Bureau of Markets in some way could propose a remedy for existing high prices of foodstuffs. That does not promote agriculture. You do not promote agriculture by trying to reduce the cost of farm commodities.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the gentleman from New York is not to be blamed for not knowing what agriculture is, because he is not acquainted with it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, there are as many farms in New York City as there are in Chicago.

Mr. MANN. We raise agricultural products in the city of Chicago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So we do in the city of New York. We are just as progressive and up to date as the gentleman's city. I know the gentleman's solicitude for the Department of Agriculture. Yet there is a limit to what even a friend of the department should do. No one in the department has ever suggested that there could be any profitable result from such an investigation as this. The Department of Agriculture has never overlooked any possible manner in which money might be expended through it, and it did not request this appropriation. We have to stop somewhere. The estimates of the departments this year are $300,000,000 in excess of the estimated revenues, and without any suggestion or request, and for an object that is purely suppositious as to its benefits, it is now suggested that we initiate expenditures in this direction. If we do not call a halt, there will be no way of ever accomplishing anything in the way of making the revenues meet the expenditures.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an observation regarding the point of order. It occurs to me that it does not require a very strained construction of the organic law to include the language of this proposed amendment. I think it may be considered as being self-evident that a food product in its inception and origin is agricultural. I think the chairman knows that nearly all of the items, at least the general items that are now included in the Agricultural appropriation bill, have come into the bill by rulings from the Chair upon the same class of objections as that now made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. When I make them they are sustained.

Mr. TOWNER. All of them have been practically admitted as being within the general provisions of the organic law. I think even the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], whose knowledge of agriculture has been derived from what he has learned from other agriculturists here in the House, would admit that a food product was immediately connected with the subject of agriculture. Although his idea is that the only possible remedy with regard to the high prices of food products is an embargo upon them, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that even the good people of the city of New York are paying, and have been paying for years, 100 per cent more for the food products they receive than the farmers are receiving for the food products on the farm.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will permit me to say that I am not only aware of that fact, but the gentleman has not kept up with the progress of events or he would know that the embargo is not the only remedy I have suggested. I have suggested several other equally effective and beneficial remedies.

Mr. TOWNER. The whole question of food products is an agricultural question, pure and simple, in its inception.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman say that canned fish is an agricultural proposition? That is a food product.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I presume that is an exception. It must be clear to the Chairman, I think, that this comes under the general provisions of the organic act so clearly that the point of order that the gentleman from New York raises ought to be overruled.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has been made frequently before when the agricultural bill has been under discussion, and some amendment has been proposed to engage in some very large and remotely connected activity. It is always argued that the Agricultural Department covers in a very broad way every possible phase relating to the production and marketing of foods. That argument can be made just as broad as the entire field of human endeavor. The Chairman has universally ruled that the fact that the food had to be produced, marketed, transported, and sold did not give the Agricultural Department the right to decide on everything relating to the production of food, which would include all land titles, land values, and land settlement in the country, everything relating to transportation, which would include all interstate commerce, everything relating to manufacture, and everything relating to the retail business, and possibly banking. There is no limit to the number of activities that gentlemen can bring under the organic act creating the Agricultural Department. They could bring all kinds of activity in which the country is engaged, and so the Chairman has universally limited it to the proximate and direct activities of the department. The purpose of this amendment is to conduct an investigation along lines which have been already proposed, which have been before the Judiciary Committee, which have been reported on in this House, which are now pending on the calendar, and that investigation is committed directly to the Federal Trade Commission.

When this question was before the Committee on the Judiciary the question arose whether it should be done by the Agriculture Department or whether it should be done by the Federal Trade Commission. I want to read for the information of the committee a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture on that point.

Mr. MANN. Is this in regard to the point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; this relates to the point of order on the question as to whether the amendment does not broaden the organic act beyond its original scope.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, July 6, 1916.

Hon. W. P. BORLAND,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BORLAND: You asked me yesterday whether I thought that the inquiry proposed in your resolution should be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission or the Department of Agriculture. I am very definitely of the opinion that it should be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission. I understand that the commission is created to make just such inquiries—

Now, evidently Congress did not intend to duplicate the authority. It created a commission to make such inquiries, and certainly there is a definite limitation on its powers.

It has the requisite powers and, I imagine, a personnel selected with reference to work of this kind. The Department of Agriculture has not all the powers required for this work or a staff selected with reference to such tasks. If it were to undertake work of this kind, it would necessarily duplicate the machinery and activities of the Federal Trade Commission. The department can and is increasingly investigating the marketing and other economic problems involved in the production and distribution of all farm products, including live stock. Its data can well be placed at the disposal of the Federal Trade Commission, and perhaps we could extend our inquiry along other lines the commission might suggest.

Very truly, yours, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Now, the Secretary of Agriculture had a very definite idea on the subject, and as Congress had created the commission with its proper powers, with proper machinery, it, ipse dixit, resulted in a limitation of the otherwise very vague powers that might be attributed to the Department of Agriculture. But, as I say, the complete answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is that there is no inquiry on earth that he could not bring to bear under the powers of the Department of Agriculture by such an argument. He could bring an inquiry into the present railroad situation under such an interpretation of its powers, and so it must appear to the Chairman that there is a reasonable limitation of the general words involved in the organic law relating to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it is more or less immaterial to me what branch of the Government service shall conduct the investigation proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I am interested, however, that some investigation shall be made. At this moment, however, I am more interested in the correct attitude of the Chair on this proposition, for the reason that an erroneous interpretation of the authority of the Department of Agriculture might in the future very materially hamper the development of that great department along the best lines of endeavor. If the Chairman will examine the language which he has before him creating the Department of Agriculture he will observe that the department is created for the purpose of investigating all problems of agriculture, and then the language follows, "agriculture in its broadest and most comprehensive sense." One of the interesting studies that has come to me in my service on the Committee on Agriculture has been the evolution that has taken place in the agriculture of this country. Not only that, but an equally interesting study has been that of the evolution of the rulings of the Chair itself upon the Agriculture appropriation bill. When I first became a member of the Committee on Agriculture I think the Chair would have then held that two-thirds of the items carried in this bill were subject to points of order. Within the past five or six years at least, the Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole have been becoming more and more liberal in their interpretation of the meaning of the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture.

If the Chair will give me its attention for just a moment I want to impress this thought upon the Chair. Agriculture 50 years ago meant one thing; agriculture 25 years ago meant another thing; agriculture to-day means an entirely different thing. If 50 years ago it had been suggested that the marketing of farm products was an agricultural problem you could have gotten very few men to agree to that proposition. Now, every student of agriculture realizes that probably the most important problem of agriculture is that of the distributing of agricultural products. We have evoluted in our definition of agriculture from the occupation of producing things to the occupation not only of producing things but of distributing them, and even financing them, and I wish the Chair, in giving its decision upon this proposition, to bear in mind that agriculture does not necessarily confine itself to producing things. Agriculture goes further and concerns itself with distributing things, with marketing things, with getting things produced into the channels of trade, into the channels of consumption. Not only that, but it goes further and concerns itself with the proper financing of things produced and the proper financing of the production itself.

I make that statement because I feel I owe it to the committee of which I am chairman and also to the progress of the Department of Agriculture, which can be very greatly retarded by any restrictive interpretations put upon the language of the organic act by gentlemen who may be serving as Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, under the theory of the gentleman from South Carolina anything that anyone suggests as applicable to agriculture must be held in order upon the Agricultural appropriation bill; otherwise the activities of the department some time in the future may be restricted. This proposed amendment provides for an investigation of certain things, including the extent and manner in which prices are manipulated, either by individuals, groups, associations, or combinations. Granting to the definition of agriculture in its most comprehensive state the most extravagant and wild notions that any gentleman might suggest, he will not be willing, I take it, to insist that agriculture consists in an investigation of the activities of any group of individuals or any combination of corporations or the activities of any produce exchange affecting the prices of foodstuffs. If any such construction be placed upon the organic act or the activities of the Department of Agriculture under the organic act, then there is no department of government, there is no activity of human effort that can not be provided for on the Agricultural bill, because in some way or other indirectly, remote, or purely imaginary it must affect agriculture as defined by the gentleman. I think it is very clear that even the wildest, most extravagant conception of what agriculture in its most comprehensive sense means does not include such an investigation as is proposed in the pending amendment. I submit that it is subject to the point of order which has been interposed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, from time to time a point of order has been made on a very large portion of the items carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill, and almost invariably the Chair has overruled the point of order and sustained these items under the broad language of the organic act. By examining the act the Chair will notice most of the items in the Agricultural bill will be subject to a point of order if this amendment is subject to a point of order. Take the item just preceding, and if the amendment which I offered is subject to a point of order that item is clearly subject to a point of order. Take the item succeeding, and if the amendment which I have offered is subject to a point of order, then the item in reference to investigating, demonstrating, and promoting the use of standards for the different grades, qualities, and conditions of cotton and for investigating the ginning, grading, stapling, baling, marketing, compressing, and the tare of cotton and for testing the waste, tensile strengths, and bleaching qualities of the different grades and classes of cotton is clearly subject to a point of order. The next item would be subject to a point of order; the next item would be subject to a point of order; the next item would be subject to a point of order.

Now, the Chair in the past has held that it was in order to offer an amendment, or that the item in the bill was in order, which dealt with agriculture and horticulture in their broadest sense; and in their broadest sense they cover the movement of the crops. That is all that this amendment contemplates.

The CHAIRMAN. The organic act under which the Department of Agriculture was established has been very liberally construed, and the act—section 520—reads as follows:

> There shall be at the seat of government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word.

Now, this amendment carrying out the idea contemplated in that section of the act simply adds, in a reasonable manner, to the scope which is referred to as to the source and use of information. And the Chair thinks, taking that view of the situation, this amendment is clearly in order, and overrules the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could not arrange for a limit of debate on this amendment?

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall close in 30 minutes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desires five minutes in support of his amendment, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] five minutes, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] desires five minutes, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] five minutes, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] five minutes, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] five, and the chairman of the committee might want five. I would ask to make it 35 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto shall close in 35 minutes, the time to be distributed as he has specified. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I rose at the time, but did not catch the eye of the Chairman. I would like five minutes if the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] will consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I tried to get the attention of the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I tried to get the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina when he was making the arrangement. I ask for five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to making it 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time will be changed to 40 minutes.

Mr. FARR. I think we had best make it an hour.

Mr. BORLAND. Make it an hour, and you will have some time left.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no undue limitation of the debate on a matter of this importance I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph be closed in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and the amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. DOWELL. May I inquire if I may have three minutes out of the hour?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Iowa may have three minutes. We will include him in the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the great vice of this amendment is that it does not go far enough to do any good and is a waste of time, effort, and money in attempting to do what it, on its face, can not do. If the amendment accomplished or could accomplish what it was expected, and on its face purported, to accomplish, it might be worth the money; but under existing circumstances it is a waste of money and, moreover, is dangerous in its tendency to head off an efficient investigation.

But I say it is designed not for the purpose of conducting an investigation such as the public demands but for the very purpose of sidetracking and making impossible the real investigation needed in the premises. There is not a bit of doubt upon that proposition. I am going to put it so clearly that every man in this House who votes on the proposition will know that if he votes "aye" on this resolution he is voting against any real investigation of the subject.

We introduced a resolution—the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] and myself—nearly a year ago in regard to the marketing of live stock. We have had hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, and at those hearings the representatives of the packing houses and all their high-priced attorneys appeared and defended. A year ago, in October, 1915, there was a hearing of the Bureau of Markets in Chicago, designed to conduct an investigation such as that provided for in the Mann amendment. They had full power to do it, and did it without any Mann amendment. They could not get anybody to appear at such an investigation except voluntarily, and the representatives of the packing houses of Chicago snapped their fingers at that kind of an investigation.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I wish I had the time to yield, but I have not. The men who were guilty refused to disclose the evidence. Then we came to the conclusion that an investigation by the Bureau of Markets was not a terror to the evildoers, and the Secretary of Agriculture agreed with us in that position, and we went before the Committee on the Judiciary and asked for an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission. Why? Because the Federal Trade Commission has power to subpœna witnesses and compel them to testify.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BORLAND. I wish I could, but I can not. There is the whole crux of the situation. You are to have a choice between an investigation by a body that has the power to compel the production of testimony and a department of the Government that has no such power.

Now, mark me: When we were making this battle before the Committee on the Judiciary every packing-house manager and every packing-house attorney was urging a resolution similar to the Mann amendment, and we were fighting it. The whole issue between the farmers and the stock raisers on one side and the packing houses on the other was whether there should be a compulsory production of evidence.

Now, mark you: The Mann amendment does not and will not and can not provide for anything but voluntary testimony. Nobody is afraid of that amendment. Every packing-house attorney in the land will support the Mann amendment. Let no man make a mistake on that subject. Every man who is opposed to an investigation of the manipulation of prices will support the Mann amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask unanimous consent—I do not know what the scope of the order is—to have unanimous consent to read at this time the resolution finally reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which it is attempted to displace by this proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let it be known that this comes out of the hour or not. I am not willing to extend the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection, provided it comes out of the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 389) directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and report to the House of Representatives the facts relating to the production, marketing, and distribution of food products in the United States, together with any violations of the antitrust laws in connection therewith, and recommendations for greater economy and efficiency in the marketing of food products and the punishment and prevention of extortion in the prices thereof.

Whereas an adequate and wholesome supply of food products at reasonable prices is vital to the life of the Nation and is becoming more important year by year as the number of citizens engaged in industrial pursuits increases, thereby enlarging the number of the consumers at a greater ratio than the number of producers; and

Whereas the scale of wages paid for labor of all classes is to be measured not in dollars and cents but in the purchasing power of such wages in the commodities necessary for comfortable existence; and

Whereas there has been a large and growing demand for all classes of American products, including food products, growing out of the war in Europe with its destruction and demoralization of the ordinary processes of peace and its unprecedented demand for commissary supplies for vast armies in the field; and

Whereas the problem of the food supply for the Nation involves the three coordinate elements of, first, production of the raw supply; second, its preparation and transportation for consumption; and, third, its distribution to the consumer, and sound economic laws require that each of these elements be maintained at the highest stage of efficiency which involves a reasonable profit to attract labor and capital to such operations, and involves also a reasonable price to the consumer measured in the standard of the earnings of the industrial worker, and none of these elements can be considered separately without demoralizing the economic system; and

Whereas in the United States we have not yet begun to reach the limit of our efficient production of food products and are capable of infinitely higher efficiency in that direction if a fair, open, and free market could be maintained between those engaged in the production of food products and those who ultimately consume the same: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed under the authority of the act entitled "An act to create the Federal Trade Commission, define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, to investigate and report to the House of Representatives at the earliest moment practicable the basic facts relating to the production, transportation, marketing, manufacture, and distribution of food supplies.

Second. The cause or causes of the present shortage and high prices of the same in view of the tremendous productive capacity of this country.

Third. Whether the apparent shortage of supply and high prices are due to any conspiracy, combination, contract, or practices in restraint of trade on the part of any person, groups, associations, or corporations engaged in any of such processes, and especially whether and what violations of the antitrust laws exist in such processes.

Fourth. The extent, manner, and methods of any manipulation of the markets or control of the visible supply of food products by any individuals, groups, associations, or corporations, and especially those engaged in the slaughtering and marketing of meat products, and also in the storage and distribution of poultry, eggs, butter, and dairy products, fresh fruits and vegetables, wheat and other cereals, and whether there is a joint control by any person, groups, associations, or corporations of the storing, preparation, marketing, and distribution of said products.

Fifth. What, if any, legislation is needed to insure the maximum of profitable production of food products in this country together with the free and open channel of distribution of the same to the wage earners and consumers at prices which shall insure a large and steady supply and be within the purchasing power of fair industrial wages.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to direct the several departments and bureaus of the United States Government, and in particular the Department of Agriculture, and the Office of Markets and Rural Organization therein, to furnish to the said Federal Trade Commission, upon its request, papers, information, and data in their possession, respectively, relating to any of the matters herein required to be investigated, and to detail from time to time such officials and employees to the commission as it may request for the purposes of conducting said investigation and preparing said report.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is nobody who wants to talk, the Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not know at this time whether I shall vote for or against the so-called Mann amendment, but I do wish to call attention to the fact that the Bureau of Markets, which may be a very useful bureau in the Department of Agriculture, has been recently created, and that in this bill provision is made for it and for the general expenses for various branches of work that it is to conduct, to the extent of $794,395. We are appropriating here for the first time approximately $800,000 for the purpose of enabling the Bureau of Markets to disseminate information as between the farmer or the producer and the consumer. That seems to be a very large appropriation for that purpose, since we are just about engaging in that particular line of governmental oversight.

The Mann amendment proposes an appropriation of $50,000 additional for the purpose of making an investigation into the high cost of living with respect to its domination by manufacturers, corporations, or otherwise; and my inquiry is, Why is the Bureau of Markets, with $289,400 appropriated to it, for the specific purpose of "acquiring and diffusing among the people necessary useful information upon subjects connected with the marketing and diffusion of nonmanufactured food products, and so forth, not already sufficiently provided with money to make this $50,000 investigation, more especially as the Department of Justice, after a long agitation for action on the part of some of the Government departments, has finally undertaken an inquiry on its own account and has published at least several reports with respect to the causes of the high cost of living?

If you will take this bill, pages 74, 75, 76, and a part of 77, covering the appropriations to the Bureau of Markets, you will observe that we are providing for a great variety of kinds of information to be acquired by "experts" to be given to the people on this very question of the high cost of living. What else is the Bureau of Markets for? Why are we providing this $800,000, approximately, to this bureau? Is it only to give employment to additional men, only to find more "experts" to put upon the Government pay roll, eventually to come forward and ask for a pension for the patriotic services they have rendered the Government? Why another $50,000 at this time, when this present administration is charged time and time again, not only with the power by law but with appropriations backing up that law to make every possible kind of investigation which the ingenuity of man can invent as to the high cost of living and the various other troubles from which the country suffers at the present time?

We have asked for three or four years why the Department of Justice did not proceed against some of these alleged malefactors of great wealth who are supposed to be responsible for the high cost of living. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] brought in his resolution, not at this session, but at the last session, asking that some action be taken with regard to the so-called Beef Trust in this country. What efforts have been made by the present administration, what action has been taken by the present administration, looking either to the passage of that resolution or to the exercise of any of the governmental functions under existing law to find out whether the so-called Beef Trust has been putting excessive prices upon the people or not?

The best we have now from the Department of Justice, in consequence of such investigation as it has made, is that the car shortage is responsible for the high cost of living. According to the report of the investigators it is not the war in Europe, but it is the shortage of cars. The Beef Trust is entirely overlooked in any report that we have had up to the present time as to the reason for the increase in the cost of living. There seems to be ample authority to make investigations if the administration will only investigate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the Committee on Agriculture had had an opportunity to consider the substance of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], probably a broader proposition would have been submitted to the committee. But this proposition is now before the committee. It is not as broad and comprehensive in its scope as I would have it, and if I did not know that any very great broadening of the amendment would subject all of it to a point of order I should offer a much broader proposition. But it seems to me that the committee is confronted with a situation which it can not escape considering. The press of the country, the magazines of the country, economic writers, and students of the food situation of the country are all agreed that a situation exists which demands the most careful inquiry on the part of legislators. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is to enable the Department of Agriculture, through its machinery already organized, and through additional machinery, if necessary, to investigate the production, transportation, storage, preparation, marketing, manufacture, and distribution of agricultural food products, including the extent, manner, and method of any manipulation of the market or control of the visible supply of such food products, and so forth. Not speaking for the committee, but for myself, I do not feel personally that I am willing to oppose an amendment which undertakes to obtain light on a matter of such supreme importance as the food supply of this Nation at this time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman think that the amendment gives the department any authority beyond what it now has?

Mr. LEVER. I think the department is not given any additional authority, but I do think that the department is given additional direction to do certain things which the department so far has not felt that it should do without a direction from Congress to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman had made that statement when the point of order was under discussion, the point of order must have been sustained, because any attempt to control a department, under the repeated and unbroken rulings of the Chair, is subject to a point of order. Of course, the amendment was clearly subject to a point of order, as the gentleman and myself well know.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit me, he will remember that the gentleman from South Carolina did not express any view as to whether this amendment was in order or out of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; the gentleman appealed to the Chair to be careful as to how he ruled, not to restrict the activities of the department by an erroneous ruling; and if he had not intended to mislead the Chair, he ought to have told the Chair what he had in his mind.

Mr. LEVER. I was about to say, when I was interrupted the second time, that I am satisfied, after thought on this proposition, that the ruling of the Chair is not out of line with the holdings of Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole on this bill during the last four or five years. The Chair has given a rather liberal interpretation to the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture, but I think not too liberal an interpretation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It could not be any more liberal.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman will recall the fact that the department has carried on investigations such as are directed in this amendment and that the department reported back to the committee that it was without authority required to successfully carry on the investigation. The danger in passing this amendment seems to be that it will defeat the very purpose sought by the investigation authorized by the Borland resolution. Furthermore it is contrary to the recommendation made by the Secretary of Agriculture and representatives of the beef producers and consumers. Is it not better to leave the question to those interested and who have given the subject due consideration to act upon suggestions made by the Secretary of Agriculture, the producers, and consumers, rather than to adopt suggestions made by those charged with violation of law to the Committee on the Judiciary, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know what is the motive back of this proposition. I assume that the motive is to get information upon a subject that is more largely in the public mind to-day than any other proposition I know of, except the European war. I do feel that the Congress and the people of the United States are entitled to such an investigation. As far as I am concerned, I do not care whether it is made by the Department of Agriculture or by the Federal Trade Commission, or whether both of these organizations act at once. If both of these services should conduct separate and independent investigations upon a matter of this great importance, I do not feel that that paralleling of service would be a waste of money, because it seems to me that the time has come for the American people to act, to prevent in the future the doing of things by great concerns with respect to foodstuffs that are now subjecting them to the severe criticism of the public, who think that they are paying the cost. As a legislator I do not hesitate to say that I want the greatest possible light upon this situation, and I want that light pouring in from every possible angle, because as legislators we can not legislate with clearness, with comprehension, with sanity, and with safety, unless we know all the facts. I myself would be very glad to support a resolution, even at this moment, to have the Federal Trade Commission set on foot an independent investigation. I want to know what their experts think. I want to know what the experts of the Department of Agriculture think. I would like to know what the experts of the Department of Justice think. There is no other question that is so pressing as this, and there is no legislation in the future that is going to affect more intimately the lives of the people of this country than that legislation which must come sooner or later, safeguarding the people against manipulation and monopolistic control of the food of the country. As far as I am concerned, I repeat that personally I want light, and too much light is not going to disturb me. The more the better; and the more light, the sooner the legislation and the better the result for the people of the country in the end. That is my personal position.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman is looking for results, then I take it he will agree with me that the investigation should be carried on by some commission or some body with authority. If so, as has been stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], the Federal Trade Commission has the power to subpœna witnesses. The Department of Agriculture has no power to subpœna witnesses. As the gentleman knows, the department carried on an investigation, and reported back to the committee that it did not have the necessary authority. It has been carrying on investigations, and it will continue to carry on investigations which under the appropriation it has the authority to carry on, and as the gentleman has stated, the resolution gives the committee no additional authority. It occurs to me, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Missouri, that you are transferring the investigation suggested from a commission with authority to a bureau without the required authority, and thus defeat the more effective investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is really seeking light, he is taking a very peculiar way of obtaining it. If this amendment be adopted and this additional appropriation be made, it will not be available until the 1st of July, and the investigation can not be initiated for at least six months. The gentleman from South Carolina states that the question is important and pressing at present, but his remedy is to begin an investigation six months from now in order to obtain light upon it; to begin an investigation by a branch of the Government that has no authority to do more than inquire and obtain voluntary statements from the persons whom they are to investigate. The gentleman from South Carolina states that, in his opinion, this proposed amendment gives no additional authority to the Bureau of Markets. The Bureau of Markets, for the purpose of acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States information on subjects connected with the marketing and distribution of farm and unmanufactured food products, has an appropriation of $289,400. If it gets no additional authority under this amendment, the only thing the amendment does is to increase the fund available by $50,000. The bureau has not asked for it. It does not want it. Simply because the gentleman from South Carolina needs light he wants to have it furnished to him from some source or other, and wishes to give the Bureau of Agriculture $50,000 that it does not want and can not use for any profitable purpose. That is not the purpose of the annual appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture. The province of this bill is to carry appropriations that are essential for the proper conduct of the business of the Government and not to make futile appropriations that will be of no use whatever.

Mr. Chairman, those who want information upon this subject need not wait for investigations. There have been innumerable investigations conducted by various governmental instrumentalities that fix plainly and clearly some of the causes for many of the evils from which we are suffering. There is some legislation that would meet the approval practically of all Members of this body that could be enacted to meet the existing situation. Of course, those who do not want any action, those who do not wish legislation to relieve existing conditions, may well, perhaps, as an excuse for no action, support a proposition to commence six months from now an investigation of conditions about which there is universal protest at this time. That may serve as a good excuse for doing nothing that will be valuable, and it will be an effective remedy to prevent action that will be beneficial.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I guess the gentleman's complaint at this time is that Congress has not seriously taken his proposition for an embargo on foodstuffs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that a question?

Mr. LEVER. No; that is a statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman took some of my valuable time under false pretenses. [Laughter.] He should not be guilty of such practices. I have not made any such complaint, Mr. Chairman. When I have a grievance about this body or any other department of the Government, I do not rely upon other gentlemen to express it. I have been in the habit of making very clear my attitude toward either the House or any other branch of the Government because of its failures. I have no doubt that some of the things I propose, to those who are uninformed, may seem ineffective, but to those who are familiar with the situation, who do not need this superabundance of light for which the gentleman from South Carolina is praying and hoping and expecting from a very valuable branch of the Government service, this remedy is not so ephemeral as he imagines. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because I consider it an indefensible waste of the public funds.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I certainly think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] was harsh in his statement when he said that those who favored the Mann amendment favored no investigation. For one, I am in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Missouri, but while it is on the calendar we all know that it can not go through without a special rule, and the close of the session is near at hand. We do know that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will seek to give light to the country and perhaps prevent the manipulations of food supply and monopolistic tendencies to control farm products.

The gentleman from New York introduced a bill here to place an embargo on food products for the purpose of lowering the price of products to the consumer of the United States. I want to say to the gentleman that the farmers have for a long time been looking for just and reasonable prices for their products, and the first time in the history of this country for the last 15 or 20 years when the man behind the plow is receiving fair consideration for his labor, the gentleman from New York, or some other man, hollers out "embargo," to lower the price of farm products. This amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is just to the producer of the products of the farm and to the consumers of this country. The gentleman's amendment proposes that no wrong be done anybody, and that the square thing may be done to the man who raises the farm products and the man in the city who consumes them. He proposes that an investigation shall be made by the machinery of the Bureau of Markets to see whether or not there has been an unfair manipulation in storage in the control of beef and all farm products, and that is what this country is entitled to. The people know that something is radically wrong. They know that when the price of a commodity leaves the farm for a reasonable sum that when it advances several hundred per cent by the time it reaches the consumer, something is unfair in the proceeding. The amendment before the House now will establish who that is, and will strike down the instrumentalities that now, under cover of law, are robbing both the producers and consumers. The gentleman from Missouri seems to think that there is no remedy on earth except his bill. We know that his bill may never be passed, and we know that the House of Representatives can now pass this amendment which carries with it the sum of $50,000, which will enable the Bureau of Markets to carry out an effort to find out what these evils are and to make recommendations for their cure. We realize the fact that the poor in the cities of this country suffer because food is too high. We know at the same time that the man on the farm is not receiving too much for his product, so that some person in the middle, some instrumentality, is guilty of a wrong that squeezes the city consumer and injures the farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have in my hand the hearings conducted by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary on the Borland resolution, containing 545 pages. In these hearings, and the printed report, is shown conclusively what the packers of the country want, and what the producers, at least a majority of them, and also the consumers of the country prefer in the way of an investigation. The hearings show that the packers, and possibly other food manipulators, are in favor of the Bureau of Markets conducting an investigation, in the face of the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, has stated over his signature in a letter which was read this morning by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that the Department of Agriculture was not in a position to make this investigation, and that the Bureau of Markets did not have the facilities, or words to that effect.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. When was the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri reported by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. December 21, 1916. Already there has been an attempt to make a sort of investigation by the Bureau of Markets, and the head of that bureau, Mr. Charles J. Brand, held a meeting in Chicago, to which representatives of the packing houses and representatives of beef producers and others were invited. The packing-house people did not appear. They took very little interest in it. The meeting was not satisfactory either to the producers of the country or to the consumers. This meeting was held November 15 and 16, 1915, in the city of Chicago, and was a complete disappointment to all who were connected with it or interested in the subject of an investigation. That was an investigation similar to what could be held under the provisions of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if it should prevail, because the Bureau of Markets has no power to issue subpœnas, to compel the production of books, or to administer oaths. The packers of the country have insisted that that is the kind of investigation that they want, if there is to be one—that it shall be done by the Bureau of Markets. They are very much opposed, as they have said in their testimony, a copy of which I hold in my hand, to the Federal Trade Commission, which is equipped to make a scientific and intelligent investigation, making such an investigation.

Mr. Fisher, a former member of the Cabinet, the attorney for the American National Live Stock Association and others interested in the cattle business, says in his testimony, which I have here, that they want to employ every legitimate agency for getting at the bottom of the business; that the Bureau of Markets can not make the investigation, and that the same should be made by the Federal Trade Commission—that is, that they propose to have the whole economic matter investigated from the birth of the steer until it is finally consumed. It seems to me that if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] prevails, that would be tantamount to sidetracking entirely the long efforts that have been put forth by the friends of the producers and consumers in trying to get a real investigation into the high cost of living and the packers' manipulation of live-stock markets.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I have spoken very infrequently in this House. Under the five-minute rule I must speak very briefly now. I rise to oppose this amendment for the reason that the first part of the amendment covers matters with regard to which the Bureau of Markets is already dealing, and for which appropriation to the full limit of its estimates is being made in this bill. This is admitted.

The other provision in the amendment is to direct an examination by the Bureau of Markets of the manipulation of prices of farm products. The manipulation of prices, gentleman understand, is now a violation of the criminal laws of the United States. I want to put it straight to you. If you adopt this amendment you put upon the Bureau of Markets the responsibility of exercising an inquisitorial power with reference to a crime, when you know that the Bureau of Markets does not possess inquisitorial powers. You can not get away from that proposition. The Bureau of Markets can not compel the attendance of witnesses, the production of documents, or even administer oath to those witnesses who voluntarily attend. An investigation by a department of the Government, bereft of the power necessary for an effective investigation, will of necessity be a farce. To my mind, it is palpably ridiculous to authorize the expenditure of the public funds by this bureau for that purpose when we have a Department of Justice and a Trade Commission created for the very purpose of investigating matters of this sort, clothed with the power to subpoena witnesses, to compel the presentation of documents, to administer oath, and to do all those things necessary to make an effective investigation, and to ascertain the real facts.

The Bureau of Markets, gentlemen of the House must know, can find out only the things from those being investigated which they want to have made known. There can be no question about that. There would be just as much practical sense in sending an unarmed private citizen without warrant to receive the surrender of a defiant criminal, to be delivered over to the sheriff, whose duty it is to make the arrest, and who is armed and equipped with process to make it, as to send the Bureau of Markets, without inquisitorial power, to get information to turn over to the Department of Justice, which has full inquisitorial power. This Bureau of Markets is being sent to do this in the very face of the fact that it is within the knowledge of the gentlemen of this committee that when it did undertake to investigate Chicago packing houses the representatives of those houses refused to appear before the representatives of the bureau and refused to give any testimony before them, and the bureau was powerless in the face of that refusal. This bureau, if it makes an investigation, will be compelled to report that it has not been able to find conclusive evidence of criminal manipulation of the price of farm products, and we will be in the attitude of having directed it to make this investigation when we knew in advance that it did not have the power to force a disclosure of the facts of criminal manipulation of the price of farm products even if those facts existed. I am unwilling to place myself in that attitude and I am unwilling to spend the public money in any such farcical undertaking. I am willing to spend any amount of money necessary to support that arm of the Government, the Department of Justice, or the Trade Commission, in the making of a real investigation of this matter and in the prosecution of those who may be found to be guilty. We will get a report back for this $50,000 and some statistics which will be filed away in a pigeonhole. I am getting tired of spending the public money gathering statistics which are never used.

The departments of this Government are bursting open now with dead information. There is not an intelligent man in America who has given any investigation and thought to this matter who does not understand, in a general way at least, the big problems with regard to which we must deal when we undertake to lessen the cost of the American table. I make that statement without fear of contradiction. The Bureau of Markets has been digging into this thing for three years, and the head of that bureau knows at this very moment everything that he could know that would help him in his work when he shall have expended the $50,000 carried by this amendment. What we want of the Bureau of Markets is constructive work, to build a machine that will shorten the distance between the field of production and points of consumption, that will stay the waste in distribution. That is its business. That is what it is equipped to do. It can not trail criminals. Why send it after them when we know that is not its business and it can not catch them? Why, I say, do this if we want to catch the criminals? That is the business of the Department of Justice.

I submit this proposed legislation is as ridiculous as would be a proposition to have the Department of Justice expend a large sum of money investigating the matter of paper containers for farm products shipped for sale when we have a Bureau of Markets organized, equipped, and educated for that very purpose. Why turn aside the efforts of the Bureau of Markets from that which it ought to do and is equipped to do and embarrass it by putting upon it a responsibility which it is not equipped to discharge?

If crime is being committed and we want to apprehend and punish the criminals, why send after the criminals a branch of the Government which does not have to do with criminal prosecutions or the detection of criminals? I am a friend of the Bureau of Markets. It has much to do. It can do much. It has yet to create a clearing house of information where the man who has something to sell can list it by type or grade, and where the man who wants to buy can have access to it, where the man who lives in the remotest producing district of this country can have access to every market, and where the most remote market in this country can have access to every field of production. When we do that and give to the Federal Government the necessary supervisory power to insure to both the producer and the consumer integrity of transaction, then we will substantially reduce the cost of living and will insure a more satisfactory reward to producers.

The building of the machine which will make that possible is the business of the Bureau of Markets, not spending the people's money in undertakings foreign to its business and which not itself but another branch of the Government is equipped to do and charged with the duty of doing.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, that there is some reason for an investigation I think no one has yet questioned or will question. The method of the investigation is the question in controversy. On the other side of the House you have all the machinery, if put in motion, to make the most rigid examination, if you so desire——

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman controvert the statement made here that the Bureau of Markets has no authority to send for persons or papers or require anybody to testify?

Mr. DOWELL. I am not questioning that authority.

Mr. GORDON. What good does it do but to spend the money?

Mr. DOWELL. I am simply making the statement that upon that side of the House you have made many claims and you have introduced resolutions to solve the high cost of living, but you have not put into operation a single particle of machinery of the Government to put it into effect. You can pass the Borland resolution in 48 hours if you desire to pass it; but you have made no progress on the subject of passing the resolution, and the House has no knowledge when the resolution will be presented, if at all. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has attempted to solve the problem by introducing a resolution to put an embargo on foodstuffs, but that resolution has never seen the light since it was presented here early in the session. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that this session is fast drawing to a close, and if you are going to do anything on this subject the time to do it is near at hand. So far as I am concerned, I put it up to you, gentlemen. If you want to solve this question, you have the machinery, when put in operation, to solve it, and there is no reason to stand here and object to any kind of an investigation because you have some other method that is being held behind. I favor some action on this subject. I know the people of the country demand some action, and I believe all of the facts should be brought forth and that Congress should put into operation every force it has in the solution of this problem. I believe it is the duty of you in the majority, who have the machinery and can act, to put some method into effect, and I am sure you will have the approval of the people if you do it. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and I am also going to vote, if I get an opportunity, for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri, my colleague [Mr. BORLAND], which has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. I can not for the life of me see why the putting of this little amendment into this bill will prevent this House at some future day, before the 4th of next March, from passing the Borland resolution. The resolution which has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary is certainly a resolution that ought to be passed. The investigation ought to be made in that manner, and yet I do not know, no Member of this House knows, whether or not we will have an opportunity to vote for the Borland resolution, and I propose here now to record my vote for this pending amendment notwithstanding the fact that my colleague from Missouri in his enthusiasm characterizes every man who supports it as being opposed to any investigation whatever. He has no right to characterize my vote in that way. I am in favor of every possible means of investigation. I want every bit of information we can get from every source possible along this particular line.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Other than simply wasting $50,000, what good will an investigation do made by a bureau which has no power to send for persons or papers or compel anyone to answer? What information will they get that will do anybody any good?

Mr. RUBEY. I will answer by quoting from the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], in which the second section provides——

Mr. GORDON. But that is not before the House.

Mr. RUBEY. Well, maybe it will come before the House. That section provides that the Trade Commission shall get every bit of information it can, and it says that it shall get information from the Office of the Bureau of Markets and Rural Organization, and directs that bureau to furnish to the Federal Trade Commission upon its request papers and information and everything which it itself has. If given $50,000, the Bureau of Markets can go ahead with further investigations, get the information, transmit it to the Federal Trade Commission, and so assist them in their investigation.

I say we ought to agree to this amendment and adopt it as a part of this bill, and then if we get a chance between now and the 1st of March we should take up the Borland resolution and pass it.

Mr. BORLAND. Will my colleague yield before he sits down?

Mr. RUBEY. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. On page 75 of the bill is an item which appeared for the first time last year, giving an appropriation of $66,800 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to gather from stockmen, live-stock associations, and so forth, all of this information that is called for now in the Mann resolution. The bill contains an item of $66,800, which covers the very evidence that the Bureau of Markets can collect, which will aid in the passage of the Borland resolution.

Mr. RUBEY. There is no question but that the information referred to by my friend from Missouri is valuable information, and the department is now, under the provisions of that law which went into effect on the 11th day of August last, working along that particular line. But they can go out and get additional information, and that information will be valuable. The bureau has able and competent men who, if authorized to do so, can get valuable information. They can not, of course, go out——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. How much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes remaining of the hour.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it in order to offer an amendment after the expiration of the hour for debate?

Mr. MANN. It is; but it will not be debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House all debate is closed. The order just extends to the debate on this amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then it will be in order to offer an amendment?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Did I understand the debate had expired?

The CHAIRMAN. When the hour agreed to by the committee has expired, all debate on this amendment to this paragraph will be closed.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet trying to get recognition from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]. The time has been allotted.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. The time has been allotted?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I have always voted against investigations and the creation of commissions for the purpose of conducting investigations. I think the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], a few minutes ago, vindicates my position during the past six years on these various investigations. The gentleman from New York stated that of the thousands of dollars expended for investigations 90 per cent of the amount was wasted—did no good. A commission is a good thing for those on the commission who draw the salaries. An investigation seldom, if ever, benefits anybody else. The American people favored the restriction of immigration. There was practically no difference of opinion as to the necessity for that legislation, but in order to postpone action Congress created a commission which lasted year after year, and in the end cost $1,000,000, and the publication of 30 or 40 volumes of testimony which nobody read. Congress knew in advance that the legislation was in the interests of the country, and yet wasted year after year and a million dollars in finding out something a majority of Congress knew in advance. That investigation was ordered 10 years ago. We have never yet written the legislation on the statute books. We spent in the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses thousands upon thousands of dollars for investigations.

First, the United States Steel Corporation was investigated. Who has ever read the testimony? What effect did it have? Then we investigated the so-called Sugar Trust. Who read the testimony? What legislation has resulted from either one of those expensive and unnecessary investigations? Absolutely none. Then we investigated the Colorado coal and Michigan copper strikes because some members of the Colorado and Michigan delegations wanted them investigated. We sent special committees to Colorado and Michigan to investigate the strikes there, and we piled up volume after volume of testimony, costing thousands of dollars; but where is the legislation? That was another waste of time and money. What the American people demand to-day is not additional investigations. They are weary of investigations. The people want prompt action on the part of the national administration and a Democratic Congress in redeeming the promise of four years ago to reduce the high cost of living. If, as charged by those on the Democratic side of the House, there are unlawful combinations to increase the high cost of living, what has become of the Attorney General of the United States and his district attorneys located in every State of the Union? What are they doing to have the law carried out and to aid their party in keeping the platform pledge to enforce the Sherman antitrust law and to reduce the high cost of living? If you are determined to have an investigation, in all fairness you should begin with the Department of Justice. Do we need an investigation to convince us that there is an increase in the cost of living or that there are combinations? What the country needs and is entitled to is a prompt remedy for conditions every Member of Congress knows to exist all over the country. Let us quit feeding a trusting public on promises, on investigations, and get down to real business. Let us have another "administration measure"—not an expensive and unnecessary investigation, but a law to reduce the high cost of living, as promised in the Baltimore platform.

The investigations referred to in this debate, if ordered, will last for months, cost thousands of dollars, and in the meantime there will be no relief for the people. Quit investigating, quit postponing, and direct your Attorney General to get busy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, let me say for the benefit of some of the gentlemen that this amendment was not prepared by, it was not shown to, it was not discussed with, packers, and they know nothing about it, and nobody else, so far as discussion in advance is concerned, outside of Members of the House. Let me make this further suggestion: The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said this would postpone an investigation. I did not put in the amendment a provision that the funds should be immediately available, because that would have made it subject to the point of order which the gentleman from New York made, but I am quite willing that that should be added to the amendment. I did not put in it the provision giving the bureau the power to subpœna witnesses, because that would have made it subject to the point of order, but I am quite willing they should have it. However, let me make this suggestion with reference to the subpœnaing of witnesses:

I had charge of the bill, originally, creating the Bureau of Corporations. They were given power to subpœna witnesses. They never did it. The Federal Trade Commission, I think—although I may be mistaken—has never subpœnaed a witness. Why? Witnesses who are willing to come do come. The minute you subpœna a witness you render him immune from prosecution. And those under investigation, under prosecution, are the most anxious to testify, because they can not be prosecuted. And when the Bureau of Corporations made an investigation of the packers some years ago, although they did not subpœna witnesses, the packers got an immunity bath because the Bureau of Corporations had power to subpœna witnesses where the production of testimony gave that immunity if done.

Now, what have we proposed? A practical method of expediting economy in the transportation of food products from the producer to the consumer, using a method which we have already created, the Bureau of Markets, engaged in that business, men who can make suggestions to the men who handle the grains, the live stock, and the other food products of the country, and make suggestions which would be of practical value. If they discover that there is manipulation of the markets, they will discover it outside of giving immunity to the men who are engaged in the business, and they will have the power to turn that testimony over to the Department of Justice, where it may be effective.

If we could—and I do not know whether we can; we have not been able to yet—if we could send one man to jail for manipulating the markets of the country, it would do more good than anything else we could do. [Applause.]

But up to date we have not been able to do anything. Where we have made an investigation we have granted immunity to the men who are guilty by making the investigation, and the investigation has done no good in any other way.

Now, this investigation, if carried on, may be of good, to begin with, in giving practical suggestions for the handling of the food products, and if they discover that there is manipulation of the market, then the men who are guilty will not have immunity. They may indict and convict. I hope the amendment may receive the approval of the body. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON to the amendment offered by Mr. MANN: "For the purpose of said investigation the Chief of the Bureau of Markets and his duly authorized agents shall have power to administer oaths, subpœna witnesses, and require the production of books and papers."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment: Insert at the end of the amendment the words "to be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. MANN: At the end of the amendment, after the figures "$50,000," insert the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, including the grain sorghums, for the purpose of fixing definite grades thereof, $106,590.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the grain-standards act passed last year has not yet been placed in operation. A committee of the Department of Agriculture is now engaged in preparing standard grades for the grading of grain, that is to say, deciding upon definitions of what shall constitute the various grades. This is a task of tremendous importance to the farmers of the Nation and also to the consumers of grain products.

Mr. Chairman, heretofore the grades for wheat have been fixed according to the weight and appearance of the grain. The entire equipment of those who have attempted to fix standard grades in the different States has consisted of a scale, the naked eye, and the fingers of the hand as to moisture. It is the contention of the farmers of the Northwest that standard grades for wheat should be determined upon according to its actual milling value. That value can be actually and scientifically ascertained; in fact, it has been done at the experimental flour mill and laboratories of the North Dakota Agricultural College by President E. F. Ladd. The experiments conducted there during recent years show that grades established according to weight and physical appearance are inaccurate, unscientific, and grossly unjust to the producers. The grades have been heretofore adopted in an arbitrary way and apparently for the express purpose of buying a large portion of the wheat at less than its milling value. Even if this were not the design, no thoughtful person will say that it is not the effect. In my remarks here last year concerning the 1915 crop I showed that there was in some instances a spread in price between No. 1 northern and rejected at 20 cents per bushel, that is to say for 60 pounds. Dr. Ladd showed by his milling, chemical, and baking tests that the actual value of the products of the rejected grade were worth more according to the market prices than the products of No. 1 northern, as follows: No. 1 northern, $2.28 per 100 pounds; rejected grade, $2.31 per 100 pounds. In other words, and do not lose sight of this, while rejected was actually worth more than No. 1 northern, the Minnesota authorities had arbitrarily established six grades to describe wheat ranging between these limits of quality. By this means the man who hauled a load of wheat of rejected grade to the elevator on April 27, 1916, according to the market reports in the Grand Forks Herald, received 20 cents per bushel less than his wheat was really worth, that is to say 20 cents less than the quotation for No. 1 northern.

This year it is worse than ever. The grain dealers are buying wheat upon the basis of nine different grades. The more grades there are the lower they can pound down the price for the so-called low-grade wheat. This year—that is, for the crop year of 1916—the spread in price between No. 1 northern and the lowest grade has run at times as great as 97 cents per bushel. It represents the most colossal hold-up ever pulled off in the grain trade.

Mr. Chairman, let me say again the grading of grain or the fixing of standards in the past has always been done simply by weight and by the physical appearance of the grain. The different States or other organizations that have adopted standard grades have never attempted to go further than that. They have never attempted to make a chemical analysis of the grain or analysis of the flour or any baking tests of the flour.

The College of Agriculture of North Dakota has been making a line of experiments during recent years of a technical, scientific kind to determine what these grades ought to be. For that purpose they have an experimental flour mill and a chemical laboratory and a baking laboratory. Having been instrumental in securing this equipment for our college while a member of the North Dakota Legislature I have studied the bulletins of Dr. Ladd with great interest and diligence. The result of last year's investigations is particularly important and reveals a situation that calls loudly for a scentific method of establishing grain standards.

There was a spread last year in the values of grain sold under different standards between the highest grade and the lowest grade of 97 cents. To describe the crop of last year—that is, the 1916 crop—nine different grades were defined by the grain dealers. Now the investigations conducted at Fargo show that these definitions, these grades that have been used, are arbitrary and have not been made according to the milling value of the wheat for the greater portion of the crop last year. I will say that in a general way the crop last year was not a good-looking crop. In appearance it was shrunken and the wheat was not up to normal.

Now, with those superficial methods that they have had in the past of establishing these standards, not going beyond the weight and the physical appearance, they branded a whole lot of this wheat as simply "feed." The grain men have been using grades that they call "A feed," "B feed," "C feed," and "D feed." Now, that indicates, if it indicates anything, that those who are doing the grading of this grain concluded that it was not wheat at all; it was not entitled to be known as wheat; it was simply feed—chicken feed.

Dr. Ladd, at Fargo, took 43 different samples of "D feed" grade, and the results of the investigation show this, that in point of absorption—that is something that is always looked to by the bakers in buying flour, because they want a flour that is capable of large absorption, and I am talking now of "D feed," the lowest grade of feed—41 samples were superior to No. 1 northern, and only two of the samples fell less than No. 1 northern, and they were only 1 per cent below.

Now, as to the volume of the bread made from this "D feed," the bakers always like a large-looking loaf. No matter what it weighs, they like a large-looking loaf. Thirty-nine samples were superior to No. 1 northern.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, can not the gentleman get along with five minutes. Let me say to him that there is a very important bill that gentlemen who have charge of it desire to put through this afternoon, if possible, and I am trying to hurry the consideration of this bill to accommodate them.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I have never retarded the progress of this bill by saying a single word during its consideration.

Mr. STEENERSON. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will allow this extension. It is very important.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I am talking now of the different points which go to indicate whether flour is valuable or whether it is not, or whether it belongs to a low grade or not. We are dealing here only with experiments made with D-feed wheat. As to the volume of the loaf, 39 samples were better than No. 1 northern and only 4 of them fell below.

Now as to the color, that is also an important item with the bakers and with every housewife. I do not know but it is more important to the housewife than it is with the bakers. The housewife wants a white-looking loaf. Eighty-eight per cent has always been regarded by bakers and experts who pass on this question as sufficient. It ought not to fall below 88 per cent. If it is 88 per cent or better, it is all right on the color question. Twenty-six samples of flour made from D-feed were above 88 per cent in point of color and 17 samples were below 88. Taking all the feed samples together and averaging them, we get 88.5. It is the most common thing in the world, in the flour trade and in the milling trade, to blend wheat. Soft wheat is blended with hard wheat, and high quality hard wheat is blended with a low quality; so that if any of these D-feed wheats did fall below 88 per cent, all that was necessary was to blend them with wheat of higher grade, to take care of the item of color. As I have shown, all the feed grades, A, B, C, and D, gave an average of 88.5 per cent, and by blending them with the grades above that the percentage of color would be raised still higher.

Texture is another point on which they judge flour and bread. All of the 43 samples of 4 feed were better than No. 1 northern. I want to call your attention especially to that. In point of texture every single one of the 43 samples of D feed examined at the North Dakota Agricultural College tested higher than bread made from No. 1 northern.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I am very much interested. Do I understand that the market buyers, wanting to undergrade certain kinds of wheat, had branded it as A, B, C, and D feed, not designating it as wheat at all, but as feed?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. They said that in purchasing wheat in North Dakota there should be these grades: No. 1 northern, No. 2 northern, No. 3 northern, No. 4 northern, A feed, B feed, C feed, and D feed.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. And actual experience has shown that bread made from D-feed wheat is equal to No. 1 northern.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It is equal in point of absorption, protein content, and volume of loaf. In color it does not equal it, because No. 1 northern will average higher than 88 per cent; but, as I explained to the gentleman, the millers blend their wheats.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I understand. I just wanted to get it clear.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The average of all the D-feed flours was equal to 88.5 per cent in color, so that in order to reach the standard it would not be necessary to blend them with higher grades, but if they wanted a still higher percentage on color, they could be blended with so-called higher grades.

Now, as to the per cent of gross increase per bushel, according to the way this wheat was purchased in North Dakota and the Northwest last year, the best sample of No. 1 northern gave a gain of 22.2 cents. None of the 41 samples of D feed fell below 100 per cent gain.

Mr. STEENERSON. Gain of what?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman understands, of course, that there is a difference between profits and increased selling price. I am talking now about the sale of products and what the gain was on a bushel of this wheat, not the profit. That could not be determined without considering a number of other items. On No. 1 northern the gross products sold at prices, according to the Northwestern Miller, which represented a gain of 22 per cent. On D feed the gain was over 100 per cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. Over what?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Over the purchase price.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Does the gentleman mean the gain over last year's level?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. No; taking the wheat of 1916, the entire products from No. 1 northern wheat sold for 22 per cent more than the purchase price, according to the Minneapolis market, for wheat, flour, shorts, bran, and the different products. The percentage of increase on the products from D-feed wheat was over 100 per cent.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman mean over and above what the farmer received for the crop?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. When were these tests made?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. During the months of October and November.

Mr. STEENERSON. In 1916?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In 1916. Now, as to the gross receipts per bushel, including screenings, during the past season, for No. 1 northern wheat they got $2.12.

Mr. MADDEN. Who got $2.12?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Those who sold the products. It is pretty hard to tell just where the profit goes, but in our country the belief is general that the grain dealers are the chief offenders and the chief beneficiaries.

Mr. MADDEN. It was not the farmer?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. No. For the poorest sample of D-feed out of the 43 samples the products brought $1.85. The average for the products of all the feed samples was $1.99¼. The best, from No. 1 northern, was $2.08½, so there was only a spread of 9 cents in the total products sold between No. 1 northern and D feed.

Mr. MADDEN. A spread of only 9 cents in the difference of the price to the miller.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In the difference of the price got by the miller when he sold all these products.

Mr. MADDEN. What was the spread above the price received by the farmer?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I can give you a pretty fair idea of it. Here is an estimate made by Dr. Ladd on a carload of wheat sold at Fargo, N. Dak., a sample of D feed. The carload was bought from the farmer for $653.01. It was sold for an advance over and above that of $1,031.72. You understand this is an estimate made by Dr. Ladd.

Mr. STAFFORD. In what period of time was there that increase?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. President Ladd took the sole price of the products and the purchase price of the wheat on the same day. He took the markets from the Northwestern Miller, of Minneapolis, Minn. Dr. Ladd is a noted chemist, who has won the entire confidence of North Dakota people because of his skillful, vigorous, and courageous enforcement of our pure-food law and because of his painstaking and thorough examination of many samples of North Dakota wheat, the results of which have been published in bulletins from year to year. I shall ask presently to quote quite freely from his last bulletin, which will reply more fully to the different questions my colleagues have been asking me. Being limited very much in time it has not been possible for me to cover each item with thoroughness, and those specially interested in this subject should read Dr. Ladd's bulletin in full.

Mr. STEENERSON. As I understand, D feed weighs only about 40 pounds to the bushel, but when you sell it you sell 60 pounds.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. STEENERSON. If you sell it by the bushel you have to give 60 pounds in weight?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; and that is where some superficial people fall down in an investigation of this question. While in fixing the grade it is said a certain grade shall weigh so many pounds, that is only to fix the grade; but when you load it into the elevator it takes 60 pounds to make a bushel. It has been found that 60 pounds of one grade of wheat and 60 of another is worth very much the same. There is no justice in multiplying arbitrary grades; that is only an excuse for pounding down the price of the low grades.

In 1873 they only had two grades. Five years later they pushed it up to three. In 1907 they had five grades, and then finding that the farmers were easy and standing for it they increased it to seven grades. When the price is fixed on No. 1 northern and a number of arbitrary grades are fixed below it it becomes possible to establish a different price for each grade, and the more grades there are the lower the price can be depressed for the so-called lower grades. Last year the grain men got the number of grades increased up to nine.

Mr. MADDEN. What was the difference between the highest grade and the lowest grade?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Ninety-seven cents. Now, the proposition that I want to drive home is that either the work of Dr. Ladd, at Fargo, is right or it is not. I claim that his standards should be followed or the officials of the Department of Agriculture should install an experimental mill and laboratories here and do the work themselves. I claim that the farmers are entitled to have the Department of Agriculture follow the scientific tests made by Dr. Ladd for several years past, or else the Secretary of Agriculture ought to institute his own experimental mill and demonstrate whether this work is correct or not. [Applause.] He should not close his eyes to scientific truth. He should not follow the old, discredited, and unscientific method of relying solely upon the sense of sight and the sense of feeling. And I do not think he will do so if he can be brought to understand how vitally it affects not only the producers but also the consumers of the country.

I ask leave to print the bulletin issued by Dr. Ladd, No. 119, issued November, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

NORTH DAKOTA WHEAT FOR 1916.

[By Dr. E. F. Ladd, president North Dakota Agricultural College.]

Two bulletins have been published containing information with regard to wheat matters, namely, Special Bulletin No. 14, volume 3, "Is the Present System of Grading Wheat Equitable?" and Bulletin No. 114, "Chemical and Physical Constants for Wheat and Mill Products," which have brought repeated demands for information with regard to the milling and bread-producing qualities of the wheat crop for 1916. It is decided, therefore, to publish the data for the 1916 samples thus far milled, giving more detailed and complete information on the completion of the year's experiments, which can not be finished before midsummer. The writer is responsible for the presentation of the matter, while all of the milling and grading results are furnished by Thomas Sanderson, and the analytical and baking results by Levi Thomas and W. L. Stockham.

Wheats at the terminal markets of Minnesota are graded in accordance with the Minnesota grades as prepared by the board of grain appeals at Minneapolis and the board of grain appeals at Duluth. From an official publication we quote the following for northern spring wheat, also for durum wheat:

"NORTHERN SPRING WHEAT.

"No. 1 hard spring wheat: Shall be dry, sound, bright, sweet, clean, and consist of over 75 per cent of the hard kernels and weigh not less than 58 pounds to the measured bushel.

"No. 1 northern spring wheat: Shall be dry, sound, sweet, and clean; may consist of the hard and soft kernels of spring wheat and weigh not less than 57 pounds to the measured bushel, and shall not contain to exceed one-half of 1 per cent of wild vetch (wild pease) or kingheads, singly or combined, and not to exceed a total of 1 per cent of inseparable weed seed.

"No. 2 northern spring wheat: Shall be dry spring wheat, not clean enough or sound enough for No. 1, but of good milling quality, and must weigh not less than 56 pounds to the measured bushel, and shall not contain to exceed 1 per cent of wild vetch (wild pease) or kingheads, singly or combined, and not to exceed a total of 2 per cent of inseparable weed seed.

"No. 3 northern spring wheat: Shall be composed of inferior, shrunken spring wheat and weigh not less than 54 pounds to the measured bushel, and shall not contain to exceed 2 per cent of wild vetch (wild pease) or kingheads, singly or combined, and not to exceed a total of 4 per cent of inseparable weed seed.

"No. 4 northern spring wheat: Shall include inferior spring wheat that is badly shrunken or damaged, and weigh not less than 49 pounds to the measured bushel

"Sample grade spring wheat: Shall include all varieties of inferior spring wheat that is badly sprouted, very musty, badly bin burnt, fire burned, badly damaged, containing live weevil, or otherwise unfit for higher grades.

"No-grade wheat: All spring and durum wheat containing 15 per cent or more of moisture, or in a heating condition or otherwise unfit for store, shall be classed no grade, with inspector's notation as to what grade same would be if in condition. For example: NG No. 1, NG No. 2, NG No. 3, etc.

"NOTE.—Hard, flinty wheat of good milling quality and containing no appreciable admixture of soft wheat may be admitted into the grades of No. 2 northern spring wheat, No. 3 northern spring wheat, and No. 4 northern spring wheat, provided weight of the same is not more than 1 pound less than the minimum test weight required by the existing rules of said grades, and provided, further, that such wheat is in all other respects qualified for admission into such grades.

"NOTE.—The variety of wheat known as 'humpback,' owing to its inferior milling quality, shall not be graded higher than No. 3.

"NOTE.—The percentage of inseparable weed seed, as stated above, shall be carried only when the wheat is of sufficiently superior quality to justify these additional defects.

"DURUM (MACARONI) WHEAT.

"No. 1 durum wheat: Shall be bright, sound, dry, well cleaned, and be composed of durum, commonly known as macaroni wheat, and weigh not less than 60 pounds to the measured bushel.

"No. 2 durum wheat: Shall be dry, clean, and of good milling quality. It shall include all durum wheat that for any reason is not suitable for No. 1 durum and weigh not less than 58 pounds to the measured bushel.

"No. 3 durum wheat: Shall include all durum wheat bleached, shrunken, or for any reason unfit for No. 2 and weigh not less than 55 pounds to the measured bushel.

"No. 4 durum wheat: Shall include all durum wheat that is badly bleached or for any cause unfit for No. 3.

"NOTE.—Red-berried durum, western soft durum, owing to their inferior milling quality, shall not be graded higher than No. 3.

"NOTE.—The percentages of inseparable weed seed established for Nos. 1, 2 and 3 northern spring wheat shall also apply to Nos. 1, 2, and 3, durum wheat.

"Mixed wheat: Eight per cent or more of spring wheat in durum, winter or western white or red wheat and 4 per cent or more of durum, winter, or western white or red wheat in spring wheat shall be graded Nos. 1, 2, 3, etc., mixed wheat."

It will thus be observed that only five grades are fixed for the wheats and in addition "sample grade" and "no grade," "no grade," of course, representing wheat in bad condition. The sales, therefore, in the terminal market in Minneapolis, for example, are assumed to be made on these grades, but it would appear that the grading of the wheat, as carried out at the point of purchase in North Dakota, is in accordance with instructions sent out from day to day from Minneapolis, as shown by the following from a notification postal card sent out regularly to the buyers of wheat.

Nor. 36. The Grain Bulletin.

The official body establishing these grades and prices is not given on the cards as they go out from Minneapolis to the dealer. It will be noticed that the grading according to this card is quite different from the official grades and does not conform with regard to test weight per bushel.

There are several additional grades—grade 4, No. 2, and grade 4, No. 3; and in addition to these a classification is made as "Feed A," "B," "C," and "D."

No matter what the grade may be at the point of purchase the terminal grade is assumed to be one of the five as indicated in the official announcement from the board of grain appeals. Therefore, No. 4–No. 2, and No. 4–No. 3 and a part of feed A should sell as No. 4°. The balance of feed A, as well as feeds B, C, and D, will all be sold as sample grade if sold under the official classification.

It may be also assumed that the term "feed" is intended to imply that the wheat had no milling value, but is to be used exclusively for feed purposes. The milling tests, together with the baking test, will therefore prove of special interest in this connection. The milling was done on the small two-stand mill. The samples were sent in from various parts of the State, some from individual farmers, from county agricultural agents, elevators, demonstration farms, etc. The number of samples in the higher grades are rather limited, but having no choice in the matter we have used them as received.

As already indicated the grading is based on a card or price list sent out to the local elevators by the Grain Bulletin from Minneapolis, and is the elevator's instructions regarding grade and price until there is received a renewal with the market changes. This card is more stringent regarding the higher grades than the grading rules issued by the Minnesota grain inspection department since there are grades which the rules make no provision for at all. Therefore the wheat would appear to be bought from the farmer by one set of rules or system of grading and sold to the terminal elevator by an entirely different system of grading if we are to judge from the information available to us. The price as quoted on the card is made apparently on the test weight per measured bushel but requires 60 pounds of wheat in each case to constitute a bushel as sold. In our comparison as a basis for the market value, we take the average of the high and low cash market at Minneapolis, as quoted by the Northwestern Miller for six days, October 11–17, inclusive. Using this average price as far down as the grades apply or correspond to the grades as shown by the card, and then using the same spread in price between No. 1°, as is shown by the card, we get the market price for all the other grades as follows:

MARKET PRICE.

Average of high and low and averages for October 11–17, inclusive. From page 173, Northwestern Miller.

Grade.	Hard red spring.	Durum.
No. 1 northern	$1.732	$1.806
No. 2 northern	1.704	1.760
No. 3 northern	1.626	1.6112
No. 4 northern	1.403	(1)
Sample grade	1.2777	(1)
No grade	1.4139	(1)

[1] Not quoted.

If we base our values on No. 1 northern, with the same spread in value as shown on the card sent to the local elevators by the Grain Bulletin, then we have the following:

Grade.	Hard red spring.	Durum.
No. 1 northern	$1.732	$1.806
No. 2 northern	1.704	1.760
No. 3 northern	1.626	1.6112
No. 4 northern	1.51	1.47
Do	1.45	1.35
Do	1.39	1.22
A feed	1.29	1.13
B feed	1.14	1.03
C feed	1.04	.93
D feed	.94	.83

If we deduct from the above figures the freight rate per bushel for any grade to the Minnesota transfer, we should then have the local value of the wheat or from Fargo approximately 7 cents per bushel.

The market quotations for flour during the same period, according to the Northwestern Miller, ending October 17, 1916, were as follows:

Straight flour, per 100 pounds	$4.426
Bran, per 100 pounds	1.156
Shorts and other products, per 100 pounds	1.567
Screenings, per 100 pounds	.675

The foregoing prices are for wholesale or carload lots and based upon the market price at Minneapolis. The above values are used throughout in the calculations for these tables.

It will be observed that the majority of the samples for this year are falling under the classification of "feed" grades, and there is in our series no No. 4 northern, although there are a few samples of the higher grades. The large proportion of the lower grades of wheat makes the grading of the milling value of the wheat an important matter this year.

The tables from 1 to 9 show clearly for themselves the facts concerning the several grades examined.

* * * * * * *

WHAT THE DATA SHOW.

A study of the tables will show, from a milling point of view, that the per cent of flour from No. 1 and No. 2 northern is fairly high and compares favorably with the results obtained at this station in other years, although the number of samples represented are limited and might run, in a larger series, somewhat different. The samples in No. 3 and No. 4 northern grades are a little low in per cent of flour compared with the same grades in other years; while in the so-called "feed" grades we have had very few samples in other years with which to make a comparison.

We find in the No. 3 and No. 4 northern grades a test weight, before cleaning, of 55 pounds to 49 pounds, and we have the per cent of flour ranging from 69.03 to 63.01, with the lowest average of any grade 65.18 per cent; in the feed grades a range from 67.78 to 50.23 per cent, with the lowest average in any grade 60.40 per cent. Between the maximums of all grades there is a spread in per cent of flour from 73.07 in Table II, sample 2990, to 50.32 in Table IX, sample 3289. If we assume that the flour from these two samples is of equal baking quality (the baking results show they are), then the flour should be of equal value; and figuring the difference in per cent of flour to be 22.75, at the value as shown of $4.426, the difference would be $1, or 60 cents per bushel. The sample giving the high per cent of flour, being No. 2 northern, the market value $1.704, would make the sample giving the low per cent of flour worth $1.104, or 16.4 cents more than the market value when based on the flour per cent alone. When we consider, for these two samples, the value of the mill products we find a difference of 33.72 cents, which would give a market value per bushel of $1.374, or 43.4 cents per bushel more than the market value when compared with the No. 2 sample. Ignoring the dockage in either case, there would be a difference in value of 43.78 cents per bushel, or for No. 2 northern, value $1.704 less 43.78 cents, equals $1.262, or 32.62 cents per bushel more than market value.

BAKING RESULTS.

A study of the data presented in the baking results will show that these samples can be blended together in almost any quantity and the flour would make a good bread. By eliminating some of the poor samples or by adding more of the good samples a choice flour could be produced. As a matter of fact, the large mills all blend wheats to get the desired results for color, texture, and loaf volume. All these wheats are good, and in general show large loaf volume and good texture, but not always standard in color, sometimes quite inferior in color, which would not seriously affect the blend and would add much in strength, for the gluten content is exceptionally good.

GENERAL AVERAGES.

If we take the general averages for the several grades as presented in the tables and bring together the data for comparison, both with regard to the milling and baking tests, we shall find that the per cent of flour is much higher for the lower grades than is generally assumed. If we examine the loaf volume, we note that for the lower grades the volume is much higher than for the higher grades, while the color averages the equal of the minimum standard for straight flours. The same is true for the texture, although it does not equal that of the higher grades, and shows the advantages that would come from being blended with other flours. The data for the combined averages is as follows:

In the same manner, if we bring together the receipts for the mill products as compared with the cost for the wheats, we shall get a better idea of the relative value and of the gain in per cent, or, undoubtedly, the comparative profits for handling the several grades of wheat, as follows:

TABLE XVI.—The receipts per bushel.

RELATIVE PROFITS.

In examining the table above we note that the per cent of flour produced by the grades of wheat Nos. 3, 4 (2), and 4 (3) are essentially the same, or above 65 per cent, and therefore, presumably, are of equal value for flour production, while in bread production they show a larger loaf volume than the higher grades and are but slightly inferior in color. Four classes of wheats graded as feed A, B, C, and D all produce above 60 per cent of flour on the average for the entire series, and it is not to be assumed that a product of as much value as this for flour production will be used as cattle feed. When we examine the bread made from these flours we find a better average loaf volume than for any other class, as would be expected from the gluten content, and the color and texture averages well. The interesting feature comes, however, it seems to me, in considering the increase in per cent of the sales price for the mill products as compared with the cost for the wheat. This can best be summarized again as follows:

TABLE XVII.—Comparison of cost of wheat and receipts from mill products.

	Cost of wheat.	Receipts from mill products.	Per cent of gain.
No. 1 northern	$1.732	$2.1031	21.4
No. 2 northern	1.704	2.1729	27.5
No. 3 northern	1.626	2.0454	25.8
No. 4 (2)	1.45	2.0486	41.1
No. 4 (3)	1.39	2.0548	47.8
Feed A	1.29	2.0323	57.5
Feed B	1.14	2.0322	78.2
Feed C	1.04	2.0055	92.8
Feed D	.94	1.9914	111.9

Clearly, if there is a profit in milling high-grade wheats, No. 1 and No. 2 Northern this year, when the gain is 21.4 per cent and 27.5 per cent, then certainly in the lower grades, where for No. 4 (3) there is a gain of 47.8 per cent and in Feed C 92.8 per cent and in Feed D 111.9 per cent, then there certainly should be a net profit for the feed wheats much in excess of that made on the high-grade wheats, and would indicate their relatively greater value than is shown by the purchase price. These figures, of course, do not show the cost of manufacture or legitimate profits; they are only intended to be accurate data with regard to the total proceeds from the sale of the various products as compared with the cost of the original material.

A CARLOAD OF WHEAT.

For convenience let us take a carload of wheat for the several grades and follow it through from the North Dakota farmer to the terminals and the milling portions back again through to retail trade to the consumer, who may have been the farmer who produced the wheat itself. This will give us a better means of comparison and one that can be easily understood and followed.

Nine of the 10 grades are represented in the tables presented in this bulletin. There were no samples with the proper weight per measured bushel to make a first No. 4 Northern grade. It should be borne in mind that these grades do not conform to the Minnesota grain-inspection rules, which provide for seven grades for Hard Red Spring wheat. The grades as shown on the card, therefore, are arbitrary and only apply when the farmer sells his wheat to the local elevator company or other dealer employing this same system of grading. For a comparison of the grades and values we will offer the following, giving the local grade and weight per bushel and value as shown by the card of October 14, 1916, followed by the grain-inspection department grades, weight per bushel, and average value at Minneapolis for the week ending October 17, 1916.

Let us use 60,000 pounds as a carload and take the nine grades, assuming that the farmer sold the product at the values here given, and calculate the returns for the same; first, the wheat as received from the farmer; then the wheat as graded in Minneapolis on the track; then the amount received by the elevator company unloaded. If we then take the data furnished from the milling experiments and calculate the market value for the flour, bran, and shorts, or mill products, comparing these with the local feed and flour values for the same products as retailed in Fargo, we shall have pretty complete information.

TABLE XIX.—No. 1 northern: Carload (60,000 pounds) bought from farmer Oct. 14, at card value, $1.58 per bushel.

Value	$1,526.75	$1,479.01	$1,387.73	$1,214.43

If we ship the same wheat to Minneapolis, according to the prices, we should have the following:

From the above total gain the farmer would find it necessary to pay his commission and losses.

On the other land, let us assume that the wheat has gone into the mill, been converted into mill products, and sold at Minneapolis wholesale prices, as follows:

Now, let us assume that the same products have been returned to the retail trade at Fargo and sold at the prevailing prices:

In the same manner let us consider the several other grades.

If we ship the same wheat to Minneapolis, according to prices on the track, we should have the following:

TABLE XXIV.—Minneapolis value of wheat cited in Table XXIII.

	Grade No. 4 (3).	Feed A.	Feed B.	Feed C.	Feed D.
Dockage, bushels-pounds	67-42	92-24	115-6	84-18	173-24

Total gain	$101.10	$108.75	$237.22	$325.26	$409.27

On the other hand, as in previous cases, let us assume that the wheat has gone into the mill, been converted into mill products, and sold at wholesale prices, as follows:

	Grade No. 4 (3).	Feed A.	Feed B.	Feed C.	Feed D.

Total value	$1,919.72	$1,850.02	$1,805.68	$1,839.77	$1,660.15
Cost of wheat on track at Minneapolis	$1,295.73	$1,161.72	$1,066.65	$1,106.09	$1,058.05
Gross gain	$693.99	$688.30	$739.03	$733.68	$602.10

As in the previous case, let us assume that the products have been returned to the retail trade at Fargo and sold at the prices prevailing, or had been purchased back by the farmer who grew the wheat, then for these respective grades we should have:

	Grade No. 4 (3).	Feed A.	Feed B.	Feed C.	Feed D.

SUMMARIZED STATEMENT.

Let us summarize more fully the data presented for the carload lots by taking the totals as received for the products at market value and show how much it has cost the farmer who brought in the carload of wheat at Fargo and purchased at market prices the mill products therefrom, as well as the intervening prices that prevailed at the terminal and as the wholesale prices for the mill products. The results will be as follows:

TABLE XXVII.—A carload of wheat from farmer to consumer.

Grade.	Price paid farmer.	Minneapolis price on track.	Mill products—
			As wholesaled.	As retailed at Fargo.
No. 1 northern	$1,526.75	$1,607.34	$2,034.88	$2,558.47
No. 2 northern	1,479.01	1,570.35	2,092.38	2,627.11
No. 3 northern	1,387.73	1,441.30	1,921.68	2,413.90
No. 4 northern (2)	1,214.43	1,288.56	1,917.85	2,409.34
No. 4 northern (3)	1,156.05	1,229.73	1,919.72	2,415.62
A feed	1,034.39	1,195.72	1,850.02	2,330.73
B feed	876.05	1,066.65	1,805.68	2,288.43
C feed	814.97	1,106.09	1,839.77	2,318.18
D feed	653.01	992.06	1,660.15	2,107.03

In the above we have attempted only to follow through a concrete example of a carload of wheat so as to show more specifically what each grade would be valued at according to the system of grading and marketing prevailing in the several localities. In other words, then, the farmer who sold one carload of wheat, 60,000 pounds, at Fargo, and purchased back the mill products from the same, as returned from Minneapolis, pays for the transaction above the price which he received for his wheat for the several grades, as follows:

TABLE XXVIII.—Increased cost of mill products over price for wheat.

No. 1 northern	$1,031.72
No. 2 northern	1,148.10
No. 3 northern	1,026.17
No. 4 northern (2)	1,195.41
No. 4 northern (3)	1,259.57
A feed	1,295.34
B feed	1,404.38
C feed	1,493.21
D feed	1,454.02

In other words, on an investment for low-grade wheat which costs, for a carload, less than one-half of that for a high-grade wheat, there was a total income very much greater than for the best wheat on the market. For example, in grade D feed, the carload cost $653.01, as compared with $1,526.75 for grade No. 1 northern; while the increase in selling price over that of the cost price for feed A wheat would be $1,454.02 and only $1,031.72 on the No. 1 northern. This would seem to lead back to the original question as given in our first bulletin, "Is the present system of grading wheat equitable?"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the phraseology is slightly different from that carried in the bill of last year under the Bureau of Plant Industry, and I wish to ask if there is a different character of work intended to be performed.

Mr. LEVER. Under the language carried in the present act the Department of Agriculture fixes the standards of grain. Now, that work is being carried on under the grain-standard act, and therefore is not necessary in this item at this time. We changed it so that none of this appropriation can be used for fixing standards.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then why is it necessary to increase the appropriation?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri who had charge of that matter.

Mr. RUBEY. Under the grain-standard act passed last August, and which becomes effective the 1st of next December, corn grades have been fixed and promulgated, and it is necessary as far as possible to prepare the grades of wheat and oats and other products, and the department wants to get them prepared and promulgated as soon as possible. It requires additional help and additional work, and that is the reason for the increased appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman states that the work carried in the appropriation of last year is going to be done under the grain-standards act?

Mr. RUBEY. The Secretary of Agriculture, under the law passed during the last session, is authorized to fix the standards, and this change of language has reference to fixing those standards.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then we may look forward to a reduction in this item after the department gets fully equipped in fixing the various grades?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes; after they have established the grade of wheat and oats, which will be done soon, I look for a considerable reduction.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of the United States cotton-futures act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States cotton-futures act, including all expenses necessary for the purchase of equipment and supplies; for travel; for the employment of persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and for all other expenses, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, that may be necessary in executing the provisions of this act, $98,600.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information from the chairman of the committee. I recall that another appropriation bill carries an item to enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to collect the tax on the sale of cotton futures, which is designed to prevent gambling in cotton futures. I want to ask the gentleman what connection there is between the work performed by the Internal Revenue Bureau and the Secretary of Agriculture. In other words, what does the Secretary of Agriculture have to do?

Mr. LEVER. Enforcement of the provisions of the cotton-futures act, except those provisions which relate to the matter of collecting the tax pure and simple, which, of course, must be done through the Treasury, is in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture. All the regulatory provisions fixing standards, settling disputes which may arise on contracts are taken care of by the Department of Agriculture. The Treasury Department has only to do with the matter of collecting the tax. The fact is, the Treasury Department does not have a great deal to do, although it must have its agent there, so that if any taxable contracts are dealt in, the tax may be collected. I may say that the gentleman who represents the Treasury Department in New York is a most capable gentleman and is doing splendid work. I have followed his work very closely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman explain what became of the difficulty discussed last year about the New York court decision against the cotton-futures act?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman will remember that in order to meet the court's decision to which he has referred, as far as possible, the cotton-futures act which had been held unconstitutional because it originated in the Senate rather than in the House, being a measure for taxation, was met by the reenactment of the cotton-futures act as a rider upon the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the question of holding over an estimate to defend the act no longer arises?

Mr. LEVER. No; I do not think the present act as it now stands has been questioned by anyone.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is an actual use for the $98,600?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of the United States grain-standards act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States grain-standards act, including such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deme necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $519,140.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 20, after the figures, add:

"Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and install an experimental flour mill and other apparatus and chemical and baking laboratories for the purpose of aiding him in establishing standards of quality and condition of wheat, barley, and other grains, as required by the act of Congress of August 11, 1916, known as the United States grain-standards act, and also for any purpose connected with the administration of said act."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the figures that I gave a few moments ago did not pass entirely without challenge. They were not directly challenged, so far as I know, by any of the grain dealers in Minneapolis or elsewhere; but what is known as the organ of the grain dealers in that section of the country, the Northwestern Miller, poked a little fun at Dr. Ladd. They called him a pseudoscientist, but they did not show where his figures were wrong. I find this, however, that one of the largest milling concerns in Minneapolis, corroborated the work of Dr. Ladd in a communication which it sent out to the trade throughout the United States. This is what they said, according to the nonpartisan Leader, published at Fargo, which succeeded in getting hold of an original copy of the letter which was sent out. It reads:

The quality of the 1916 crop as milled by us is excellent. There will be a marked increase in the loaf volume.

This corroborates Dr. Ladd's statement that all of the D-feed samples were larger in loaf volume, every single one of the 43 samples. The letter continues:

The gluten content will be from 11 to 12 per cent, which is considerably larger than the 1915 crop.

That also corroborates the statement I made a while ago. Gluten and protein are used interchangeably.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Did not the agricultural experiment station at Fargo make some investigation as to the relative amount of gluten in the high-grade wheat and also the lower grades?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes. They found in the 1916 crop, the so-called low-grade wheats had more gluten than the high grades. That is corroborated by this big milling concern. Then they go on to say:

The time of fermentation will possibly be one-half hour longer than last crop. Owing to extremely warm weather during the ripening period, the wheat has already gone through the sweat and, consequently, the difficulties often experienced in handling new wheat flour will not be noticed to any extent.

That sweating process was because of the peculiar crop conditions that made the wheat look shrunken in appearance, and the shrunken appearance is what the Minnesota authorities graded the wheat on last year. I claim that is wrong; they ought to ascertain the real milling value by milling, chemical, and baking tests. The letter goes on:

The indications are that the absorption will be about 2 per cent to 3 per cent higher than the previous crop.

I showed you a few moments ago that 41 out of the 43 samples made from D feed were higher in absorption than from No. 1 northern.

So, Mr. Chairman, we have the work of Dr. Ladd corroborated by one of the largest milling concerns in the United States.

If I could get the time, I would like to tell you about how farmers are hauling the so-called feed for many miles to a mill in the State of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and bring home good flour for it at a cost of 15 cents per bushel.

As to the cost of putting in apparatus to do this work, it cost only twenty-five hundred dollars to install the plant at Fargo. I was present with the officials—former President John H. Worst and E. F. Ladd, chemist—at the time the work was done, and I recall distinctly that that was the cost. Dr. Worst was greatly interested and prophesied much for it. I have a letter from the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., of Milwaukee, that made the plant at Fargo, and they say that the price is the same, that they will put one in at Washington for twenty-five hundred dollars. I think there should be a few other small items added to it that probably would make the cost about $3,000.

The chairman has made a point of order against the amendment. I would not be surprised if the Secretary of Agriculture has authority now to install apparatus. In the grain-standards act passed last year it was provided that $250,000 would be available for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of the act, and the explanation in the committee report of this particular item in the bill before us reads in this way:

Grain-standardization investigations (p. 76, line 24): This item has been transferred from the Bureau of Plant Industry. The language has been amended so as to eliminate the authority to fix standards. There is an apparent increase in the item of $17,820, but as $3,060 has been transferred to the statutory roll, there is an actual increase of $20,880. This sum will be used to facilitate the investigations looking to the determination of the standards required under the grain-standards act.

It seems to me as though the Secretary, if the point of order made against my amendment is sustained, has authority now under the appropriation made at the last session and the appropriation now being made to include any necessary apparatus in the shape of an experimental mill at a cost of $3,000 or so.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I regret to have to make the point of order. I make the point of order that it is not authorized by law.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it the opinion of the chairman of the committee that the Secretary of Agriculture now has authority to use the appropriations made at the last session or the one being made now to buy the necessary apparatus to make these tests?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think that the Secretary of Agriculture has the authority to establish a laboratory for baking purposes or a flouring mill.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I am directing my question now to purely experimental purposes, to ascertain the milling value of wheat grown in the United States.

Mr. LEVER. I am very candid with the gentleman. I think his amendment goes far beyond the purview of the law.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is it not the purpose of the grain-standards act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of quality?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Grades for grain sold in the United States.

Mr. LEVER. That is one of its purposes, of course.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. If you do not pass this amendment, or if a narrow interpretation is given to existing law, the Secretary of Agriculture will be confined only to what he can weigh on scales, see with his eyes, and feel with his hands.

Mr. LEVER. Of course, if the Secretary of Agriculture feels that he must have a flour mill and a bakery and all these things in order that he may establish standards; he will come to the committee and make that report, but until he does that the committee would feel that it ought not to allow this to go through.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I am asking the chairman now whether, if this is voted down, the Secretary will not still have under existing law permission to go ahead?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think so.

Mr. MOSS. I would like to ask the chairman if there is any more need for the establishment of a flour mill and a bakery in order to establish standards for wheat than for corn or any other product?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think so. That is a matter of judgment. I do not think the grain-standards act authorizes him to go so far in machinery as to establish a flour mill or a bakery.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I am not asking for a commercial flour mill, but a small mill to grind samples of wheat. The farmers were assured last year that the grain-standards act would bring them relief from crooked State-grain inspection systems. If the Secretary of Agriculture has not the authority now or is not given authority to proceed along scientific lines, the farmers in their marketing of grain will be simply jumping from the frying pan into the fire.

Mr. LEVER. That is a matter we will consider. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina as to the number of persons employed by the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States grain-standards act. That act as written originally——

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania direct his inquiries to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], who is the author of this legislation and in charge of this matter?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall be very glad to do it. I call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that $519,240 is provided, half a million dollars, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to employ such persons and means as he may deem necessary to carry out the grain-standards act.

Mr. RUBEY. The Secretary of Agriculture in his estimates figures that he will need something like 218 men to put this act into force.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are they all specialists?

Mr. RUBEY. Some of them; a great many of them will be specialists.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will they come in under the civil service?

Mr. RUBEY. They are all under civil service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Have their salaries been fixed?

Mr. RUBEY. The salaries have been fixed in a way. They run from $1,200 up to, in one case, $3,500; but so far only one man has been employed at a salary of $3,500. The higher salaries will average about $3,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The average will be $3,000?

Mr. RUBEY. I say, the high-grade salaries will be about $3,000. There are three men now employed at $3,000 or a little above.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary has recently issued Bulletin No. 17, "service and regulatory announcements relative to United States grain-standards act," in which he gives the names and addresses and the districts of persons recently licensed to act as inspectors of grain. How are those persons paid?

Mr. RUBEY. Those persons are paid in this way: Where they are employed under the State they are paid by the State. Where they are employed under boards of trade or chambers of commerce they are paid by those organizations. They are not paid by the United States Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are not paid by the Government?

Mr. RUBEY. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At least 250 of these men are already licensed?

Mr. RUBEY. There are about 300 licensed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. About 300 altogether. What about the supervisors?

Mr. RUBEY. There are about 39 trade centers where eventually one or more supervisors will be located. Up to the present there are 32 places where supervisors will be placed. For convenience in supervision the country has been divided into eight districts, and in each of these eight districts a very high-grade supervisor will be placed, who will have general supervision over the inspection in his district. Of the 32 places in the United States at which there will be supervisors there are 3 places—Chicago, Minneapolis, and Kansas City—where there will be as many as two assistant supervisors, and there are 15 places where there will be one assistant supervisor. Now, as I said before, there will be a general supervisor in each one of these eight districts who will supervise all the inspections in those districts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To be worked up in pyramid form, as it were. What will be the salary of the general supervisors, those at the top?

Mr. RUBEY. From $3,000 to $3,500.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These are not fixed by law but by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. RUBEY. By the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The other supervisors in the 32 stations will receive what salaries?

Mr. RUBEY. Their salaries are fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and they will be in the neighborhood of from $2,000 to $3,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman whether the major portion of this $519,140 will go for salaries?

Mr. RUBEY. For salaries and traveling expenses and rents and things of that sort. I will say this to the gentleman, that the work of these supervisors is done in the large cities and offices in large cities cost quite a good deal of money, and the expense item in maintaining offices where these supervisors will do their work is necessarily high.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are all new places?

Mr. RUBEY. They are all new places. In one or two cities they have been able to get rooms in a Government building, and in cases of that kind there will be no rent to pay.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Have any of these supervisors generally, or in the 32 places, come from boards of trade or exchanges?

Mr. RUBEY. They have come from boards of trade and from State departments, and by the appointment of men who have been in the grain business for many, many years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As a matter of fact, in taking over this new branch of Government service, we have also taken over a number of employees of fixed institutions?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the Government will now pay their salaries? That is the fact?

Mr. RUBEY. They will pay the salaries of the supervisors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ALEXANDER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10384) entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States."

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Administration of the United States warehouse act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States warehouse act, including the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $59,620.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask a few questions as to persons and means to be employed by the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the purposes of the United States warehouse act, for which $59,620 is appropriated. How many men will be engaged in this work?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the enforcement of the warehouse act has progressed so little thus far that what I would say to him would be almost a rough guess. The committee accepted, in view of this situation, the recommendation of the department on it, with the feeling that they themselves could not very well tell how many men they would need in this service. The warehouse act is just beginning to be organized within the past week, and these estimates were made up some time ago, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The department asks for approximately $60,000 to begin the work?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the committee has recommended approximately that amount?

Mr. LEVER. We recommended what the department asks, which is a small increase in the amount carried in the bill. The act itself carries an appropriation of $50,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary will fix the salaries in this instance as in the Government grain-grades act?

Mr. LEVER. Precisely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will they come up through the civil service or be appointed originally?

Mr. LEVER. They will be appointed originally under civil-service examination.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman indicate what their salaries will be? I am asking this because this is a peculiar bill, although a very important one, in that appropriations are made in a lump sum and there is no way to ascertain just what men are receiving or what they ought to receive unless we ask these questions at this time.

Mr. LEVER. Certainly. The salaries under this item, as I gather it from the gentlemen who are in charge of the act, will range from $3,600 down to about $2,000 in the supervisory positions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What kind of employees will be necessary to earn $3,000 or thereabouts?

Mr. LEVER. The man who would draw a salary of $3,000 or $3,500 ought to be a man who possesses not only a great deal of technical skill in the grading and classing of cotton and other farm products mentioned in this act, but he also ought to have considerable executive and administrative ability.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How many employees have been necessary up to date?

Mr. LEVER. I am inclined to think there have not been more than one or two in this work. They have just organized. This is simply a case of trusting the good judgment of the department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is all new work, and these are new places created or to be created?

Mr. LEVER. New work; yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Bureau of Markets, $1,670,075.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman from South Carolina ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the total? There should be a correction here.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. But before doing that, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page——

Mr. MANN. Let us get the authority to correct the total.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent first, then, that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals.

Mr. MANN. Throughout the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals throughout the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Now I ask unanimous consent to return to page 36, line 24, in order to offer an amendment to correct an error.

Mr. HAWLEY. That has already been done, has it not?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; but we have to recorrect it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 24, in lieu of "$6,009" insert "$16,009."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the committee will remember that the bill provided for $16,009 for the Oregon Forest. The Book of Estimates, which is before the committee, carries $6,009. Acting upon the assumption that the estimate was correct, I asked to correct the bill. The gentleman from Minnesota called the attention of the committee to it. Now I have information, through a letter from the Chief of the Forest Service, that the amount in the estimate was incorrect, and not the amount in the bill, so that the bill ought to carry $16,009 for the Oregon National Forest. I ask unanimous consent to make that correction. That is just what is printed in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the item on page 64, lines 10 to 13, with a purpose of offering the amendment which I submitted to the committee this morning, and which was temporarily passed over at the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I now offer the amendment, to follow line 13, page 64. It is in the hands of the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 64, to follow line 13, insert the following: "The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the erecting of modern fireproof buildings for the use of the Department of Agriculture for a period not to exceed five years, renewable at the option of the Government for an additional period not exceeding five years, at annual rentals not to exceed the amount herein appropriated at a rate per annum per square foot of available floor space not to exceed 34 cents."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Illinois reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in the same phraseology, virtually, as that carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of last year, conferring authorization upon the Attorney General and the Secretary of Labor to rent buildings for a term of years, except that the rental has been changed from 36.3 cents to 34 cents per square foot.

The reason for the modification is that the Secretary of Labor has been enabled to enter into a contract under these terms at a rental of less than 34 cents—namely, 33.3 cents—and the Attorney General has been enabled to enter into a contract for a building which I regard as the best private office building recently constructed for the use of the Government, at Vermont Avenue and K Street, at 34 cents. The Department of Agriculture has been renting modern office buildings at rates under terms of merely one year. They have not been able to secure as good terms from the owners because of the restricted terms. This amendment, I hope, will enable the Government to obtain the same liberal and reasonable terms to the Government as have been secured by the Department of Justice and the Department of Labor for their use.

We are acquainted with the building specially constructed for the use of the Bureau of Chemistry, which can not compare, either in construction or architectural beauty, with the fine office building that is just about to be opened for occupancy by the Department of Justice, a building with two stories finished with sandstone, and upper stories finished in modern style. The buildings that will be used by the Department of Justice will be in a neighborhood where the valuation of land is not nearly so high as that of those that have been constructed for the use of the other departments of the Government, and I really believe that the Secretary of Agriculture, under these terms, permitting him to enter into a contract for at least five years, renewable at the option of the Government for another five years in case the Government needs the building for that extended period, will be enabled to obtain for the Government quarters at much less than 30 cents per square foot. This amendment is along the line of economy, and I hope there will be no objection to its adoption.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman give the House any information as to what is proposed to be done or where these buildings are to be constructed?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] on Saturday obtained unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture containing data as to the cost of present space used by the various bureaus of the Department of Agriculture, which is found on pages 1091 to 1094 of the RECORD. In that letter the Secretary of Agriculture points out that at the present time for quarters for the work of the grain standards we are paying as high as $1.12 per square foot in the Munsey Building. That, it is true, includes the cost of care, upkeep, and elevator service, whereas this rate of 34 cents would be merely for the rental of the floor space, with the upkeep to be borne by the department.

It is the desire of the Secretary of Agriculture to withdraw these activities from these high-priced, down-town office buildings into a rented building near the department. Saturday afternoon, after the adjournment of the House, I happened to walk, as is my wont, through the Mall, and there I saw preparations being made, I assumed, for the erection of a building for the use of the department, right east of the present Agricultural Department building, the ground being all fenced in.

Mr. HAUGEN. How far from the department building?

Mr. STAFFORD. Immediately east of the department building. Whether it is to be used for that purpose I can not say. It seemed to me that it was on Government property, and it was all fenced off, had a large derrick and the necessary construction to chute the fluid concrete down into the reinforced forms, and ready to go ahead. Whether that is so or not, I do not know, but it is the intention of the Secretary to obtain contracts from owners near the present quarters, so as to have all the activities of the Agricultural Department focused around the present departmental building and withdrawn from the high-priced, rented private buildings down town. That is his policy.

The Department of Justice have secured floor space of 120,000 square feet in this new building at Vermont Avenue and K Street, enabling them to center all their activities in one building. Prior to this time they have been in four or five buildings scattered throughout the city, distant from the office of the Attorney General, and in some instances paying as high rental as $1 or more per square foot, such as is paid in the Southern Building. Any person who is in favor of this economy will favor this proposition. It is along the lines recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture, and we all know that that department has had considerable additional activities thrown upon it by the warehouse act and the grain-standards act, which have required additional room. They have not that available space at present, and must necessarily have gone into the new office buildings, such as the Munsey Building.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the situation in reference to the buildings of the department is clearly stated in the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture on page 1091 of the RECORD of last Saturday, January 6, 1917.

There is a $20,000 increase provided for in the bill, and the Secretary of Agriculture says that the object of this $20,000 increase in rent is to concentrate the buildings of the Agricultural Department. He says:

> If the increase of $20,000 in the rental appropriation is granted, therefore, the department intends to make every effort to secure a building of considerable size. If it can secure a new, modern, fireproof office building providing, say, 100,000 square feet of floor space, this will not exceed our immediate present needs. The Office of Markets, with the cotton standards, grain standards, and warehouse legislation to execute and no quarters for the additional employees needed, has been forced to rent high-priced offices in the Munsey Building away from the bureau headquarters; the Forest Service is seriously hampered for space; certain units of the States Relations Service are crowded to a point where efficient work is almost impossible; and the Bureau of Chemistry, the Bureau of Biological Survey, the Federal Horticultural Board, and other branches of the department are in urgent need of more room. The department feels very strongly that its plea for immediate relief, represented by the $20,000 increase proposed in the rent fund, is thoroughly justified by actual present conditions, and that it can not properly execute the tasks laid upon it by Congress without such relief.

He states further in this letter:

> In conclusion, I wish to lay before you a few figures to indicate something of the growth of the Department of Agriculture in recent years. The new buildings known as laboratories A and B were authorized in 1903, and for that fiscal year the total appropriations to the department were $5,015,846. The buildings were completed and occupied in March, 1908. For that fiscal year the total appropriations were $13,037,802, of which $12,595,502 was actually disbursed. The department had outgrown the new buildings before they were completed. Since 1908 the growth has continued, and for the fiscal year 1917 the total appropriations are $36,128,852, or nearly three times the disbursements in 1908. The disbursements for rent in 1908 were $65,705, and for 1917 will be about $142,000, or about two and one-quarter times what they were in 1908. The appropriation for rent has therefore not kept pace with the growth of the department, and the result is a serious overcrowding in many bureaus.

The Secretary further states that the average rental per square foot gross is 30 cents a square foot throughout this department. The average rental in the other departments of the Government is, in the State Department 49 cents per square foot, in the Treasury Department 35.3 cents, in the Navy Department 37 cents, in the Interior Department 35.4 cents, in the Post Office Department 34.5 cents, in the Department of Justice 41.2 cents, in the Department of Commerce 35 cents, in the Department of Labor 35.8 cents. So it shows that the amount paid by the Agricultural Department is lower, on the average, than is paid by any other department.

This amendment provides that the amount of the expenditure for annual rental shall not exceed the amount herein appropriated—that is, $143,689—and it would give the Secretary of Agriculture authority to lease modern fireproof buildings for the use of the Department of Agriculture for a period not exceeding five years, renewable at the option of the Government for an additional period of not exceeding five years. The rate per annum per square foot of available floor space is not to exceed 34 cents. Therefore they would not have any authority to go above 34 cents, and, of course, the Department of Agriculture would make the best trade possible, and would secure the necessary floor space at less than 34 cents per square foot if it was possible for them to do so.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I am wondering why we do not build instead of scattering the activities of the various departments in rented buildings.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I am going to reach that. If the Department of Agriculture should be able to make a contract for a fireproof building at 34 cents, it would be at figure less than is being paid by the other departments of the Government. If the department should be able to make additional contracts at the rate they are now paying, it would be 30 cents per square foot.

There is no question but what the department requires these buildings. There is no doubt about that in the world, because the Secretary of Agriculture states in the letter which he wrote to me that the department had already outgrown the main buildings before the construction of them was completed and before the department had an opportunity to occupy them. They are paying rent in the Munsey Building at $1.12 per square foot.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. In many parts of the country the rent is higher even than that. In Boston the rent is $2.22 per square foot, where it is necessary to acquire floor space for an office to carry on investigations under the grain-standards act. Therefore, as was said a moment ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin, this provision is in the interest of economy and will result in economy to the Government if adopted.

The department has been anxious for years to secure enactment of just such a provision as this. They have had it in former bills, but it went out on a point of order, as it will go out now if insisted upon, but I trust that my splendid and genial friend from Iowa, who is always in favor of economy and the improvement of the service, will not insist on his point of order, but will let the House have an opportunity to vote on this proposition.

The question was asked a moment ago by the gentleman from Ohio why we do not build buildings instead of renting them. I am frank to say to my good friend that I favor building all the buildings that are necessary for the use of the Government of the United States. There is not a business man in the country who has the money or who could secure it at a reasonable rate of interest but would construct buildings for the transaction of his business rather than continually rent them, because the hardest money to pay is rent money, and when you once pay it it is gone and you have no interest in the building and have no benefit to be derived from it after the expiration of your term of rental. Therefore I believe that we should exercise good business judgment if we would build buildings for every department of the Government in the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think we ought to finish the present agricultural building between the two wings that have been built?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I certainly do.

Mr. MANN. I think if the powerful Committee on Agriculture would put its shoulder to the wheel it could get an amendment to the public-building bill for that purpose.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I would be willing to put my shoulder to the wheel to bring it about, if possible to do so.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I have heard it stated several times within the last three or four years that contracts have been made by the Government for a building for the use of the Government and that the rentals have paid for the building itself within a period of 10 years. Is that within the belief and knowledge of the gentleman, who has paid some attention to that matter?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I have not the information on that point. Now, I want to make one further statement and I am through, and that is that the Secretary of Agriculture himself—and I speak by authority—is anxious to have this provision put in the bill. I have communicated with the Agricultural Department, and if this is adopted it will not only meet his approval but he is exceedingly anxious that it should be adopted in order that he may bring about convenient location and concentration of the buildings occupied by that department; and, further, that if adopted it will result in economy and the saving of money to the Government.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I infer from the statement of the gentleman that the object now is to construct a building on the site selected for a department building, as was done three or four years ago, when a six or seven story building was erected south of the department building on a site selected for a department building.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that I had no knowledge, except I noticed while casually walking through the Mall last Saturday afternoon that they are proceeding with the construction of a building on what I believe is Government property. If the gentleman is acquainted with the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture concerning the item as carried in the appropriation bill, he will realize that without this amendment the Secretary of Agriculture intends to rent a building, under an annual lease, because he says if you grant him the $20,000 additional he will proceed to enter into a contract for a modern fireproof building. What would the contract be? Only for a year. My amendment is only for the purpose of trying to secure a lower rate, authorizing him to enter into a contract for five years, which will enable him to secure a lower rate. The purpose of the gentleman from Iowa will not be accomplished by making a point of order. The only purpose obtained by him, if he succeeds in his point of order, will be to obtain a higher rate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, as I have said, if it is the purpose to erect a building on the site or in the immediate vicinity of the site selected for a department building, I feel compelled to make the point of order. If it is contemplated to enter into a contract to hire a new building, I trust the Secretary will exercise better judgment than he did four years ago in hiring a building constructed on the site selected for a department building, and which, of course, will defeat the plan of constructing a department building in the near future.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The gentleman refers to the building across the street?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; I believe it is called the Bieber Building, on the site selected for the department. I understand it is the purpose to put a building on the other corner, which will defeat the plan of building a department building in the near future.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Would it not be an enlargement of the present building?

Mr. HAUGEN. The building that was built three or four years ago would have to be torn down and necessitate paying for it, thus incurring an additional expense of several hundred thousand dollars. I take it that no one would construct a building at an expense of several hundred thousand dollars with a lease for one year, although they might with a lease for five or six years.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes that we must trust the heads of departments to exercise some discretion, and that they will do nothing contrary to public policy. The Secretary under the authorization, without the amendment, of course, could go ahead and rent a modern fireproof building, to utilize the $18,000 now paid for use of the Forestry Service, with $20,000 additional, and enter into a contract for one year—and we know that the owner would have the contract for several years to come—and in the new building merge the several activities now carried on in outside quarters. This amendment only enables the Government to secure better terms.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will give assurance that the building will not be constructed on the site or in its immediate vicinity, I shall withdraw the point of order, but I object to putting up any further buildings on the location selected.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can give the gentleman this assurance, that under that authorization carried in the bill he will go ahead and, as stated in his letter, enter into a contract for a modern building, and this amendment will merely enable him to get better terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa referred to property just south of the Agricultural Building.

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. As a site selected for the Agricultural Building?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is news to me. Who selected that site, when was it selected, and by what authority?

Mr. HAUGEN. That was selected at the time when Col. Roosevelt was President of the United States, and, as the gentleman knows, instead of putting up a complete department building they put up two wings over there, and, of course, the plan was to complete it at some future time.

Mr. MANN. But I do not think those plans contemplated going across the street.

Mr. HAUGEN. I was so informed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and by different people in the department.

Mr. MANN. I think that is an error. The plan contemplated a building to be constructed between the two wings.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, the main entrance—that is true.

Mr. MANN. No; the other. I do not think they contemplated going across B Street SW.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is exactly what was contemplated, a square building with a large court.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman that it would be desirable to have a new Agricultural Building, but I doubt whether it would be desirable to close up B Street.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is why I am objecting to these leases, and, as I have said, if the gentleman can give me any assurance that the buildings to be constructed are not to be constructed on the site or in its immediate vicinity, I will withdraw my point of order. This is a matter that has been before Congress for a number of years. We have succeeded heretofore in defeating it, and I trust it will be defeated now.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am not authorized to speak with certainty, but I think the gentleman can be assured that if the ultimate authority is given in this provision that is pending no building will be permitted to be constructed or leased by the Agricultural Department upon any site where it is contemplated to build the agricultural building, because we expect to finish that building some of these days, and I hope it will be done very soon. I am frank to say, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago, that I have no information myself that this building across the street is on that site, or that it was contemplated that the agricultural building when completed would cross B Street SW. so that part of it would be constructed on the other side, thereby crossing the street car track that runs along that street. I do not think that that would be done, but if it was contemplated originally under the plan as suggested by the gentleman, permit me to say that that is now barred by the statute of limitations and I do not think that we would be permitted to have it done.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. I shall have to insist upon the point of order unless I can have some information as to where this building is to be constructed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman be satisfied if we placed a limitation upon the amendment to the effect that no contract or lease shall be entered into for a building to be erected on property on which it is contemplated to construct a Government building for the Department of Agriculture for which plans have been prepared?

Mr. HAUGEN. I shall not object to it if you put that limitation on.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. What is that?

Mr. STAFFORD. A limitation that no contract or lease shall be entered into for a building to be constructed on property on which it is contemplated to construct a building for which plans have been prepared for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that the gentleman get the desired necessary information so that he can inform the House exactly what it is proposed to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, if the gentleman had read the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture printed in the RECORD of Saturday, he would have come to the conclusion that under the amount now carried in the appropriation bill the Secretary of Agriculture has authority to enter into a contract of lease and intends to enter into a lease for one year for a modern fireproof building to merge the activities of the department, and it is common sense that if the Secretary of Agriculture enters into a contract for but one year, he can not get as favorable terms as if he entered into a contract of lease for a longer period. The amendment I propose is for that purpose, and nothing more.

Mr. HAUGEN. If we are to discuss common sense, then we will move part of the department to the Maltby Building. Furthermore, I suggest that the department should take some notice of the direction given by Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman was as well acquainted with general matters——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Iowa was as well acquainted with conditions pertaining to the Maltby Building as he is generally with matters pertaining to the Government, he would know that Congress authorized the razing of that building.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Iowa knows that Congress two years ago decided that it should not be demolished; the Agriculture bill was so amended in the Senate and conference.

Mr. STAFFORD. A provision was carried in one of the appropriation bills last year authorizing the razing of the building.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 64, at the end of line 13, insert as a new paragraph as follows: "For the completion of the Agriculture Department building, $2,000,000."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the following resolution in my two minutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 436.

Whereas there has been undue and unnecessary friction between the correlative branches of Government located respectively in Wall Street, N. Y., and Washington, D. C.; and

Whereas the Washington branch held the opinion that peace was to the advantage of the Nation and the world, where Wall Street more largely profited by a state of war; and

Whereas the President of the United States in ignorance or heedlessness of Wall Street interests, did humbly ask the nations at war whether in their respective views it might not be well to consider the possibility of desisting from slaughter; and

Whereas it has been alleged that rumors of such diabolical questioning reached some of the speculators of Wall Street before it reached others, to the result of inequality of profit among said speculators: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That all rumors of such leakage of information be pursued to their lairs and that the Rules Committee of the House examine all brokers, newspapers, ticker tapes, secretaries, stenographers, Members of the House and Senate, and all sources of news, rumors, and lies, including all liars, ancient, modern, and prehistoric; and further be it

Resolved, That out of the contingent fund of the House be paid all losses accruing to speculators in Wall Street stocks for the week of December 18 to December 24, 1916; and furthermore be it

Resolved, That the President and each and every Representative, Senator, Cabinet officer, stenographer, and clerk be assessed one month's pay toward the restitution aforesaid; and be it further

Resolved, That it shall not happen again.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman offers that as a new paragraph to the bill, then I make a point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the existence of the pink boll worm of cotton in Mexico and the movement of some 500 carloads of cotton seed from the infested districts in Mexico to milling points in Texas and elsewhere, and to prevent the establishment of such insect in Texas or in any other State by providing for adequate inspection and the employment of all means necessary, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, to prohibit the movement of cotton and cotton seed from Mexico into the United States, including the examination of baggage and railroad cars or other means of conveyance and the cleaning and disinfection thereof; to inspect mills in Texas or elsewhere in the United States to which Mexican cotton seed has been taken for milling; to supervise the destruction, by manufacture or otherwise, of such seed and the thorough clean-up of the mills and premises; to conduct local surveys and inspections of cotton fields in the vicinity of such mills and ports of entry in order to detect any instances of local infestation, and to determine and conduct such control measures in cooperation with the State of Texas, or other States concerned, as may be necessary to stamp out such infestation, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $50,000, available immediately and until expended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph, or I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to dispose of this matter; then he can find a place?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state to the committee that the message from the Secretary of Agriculture to Congress acquainting it with the condition to which this item refers has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee has jurisdiction of deficiency appropriations, or appropriations of a character like this, and will undoubtedly give consideration to this matter. Under those circumstances, unless the gentleman can advance some good reason, I will be constrained to make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is going to make the point of order—of course I recognize the fact that this is a deficiency appropriation and is subject to the point of order, but I desire to say to the gentleman that which he knows, that this item was estimated for in a supplemental estimate which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, at least the letter of the Secretary was. The committee at that time was in session, had not completed its bill, and the chairman of the committee had information before the estimate was submitted that it was to be submitted, and when Dr. Marlatt, who has charge of the work of the Horticultural Board, was before the committee the committee undertook to get some information from Dr. Marlatt in regard to the pink boll-worm situation.

Now, while I recognize the fact that we have transgressed the rules of the House in bringing in a deficiency appropriation, at the same time this work is being done by the department and is of a character that is really in the province of the Committee on Agriculture; and, in addition to that, if the gentleman will permit me, it was brought to the attention of the committee that the seriousness of this situation had not been brought to the notice of the Department of Agriculture until the 1st of November, 1916, long after the estimates had been submitted. I would say further that from information we had the pink boll worm is regarded by the experts of the department as being even more destructive to cotton, if that is possible, than the boll weevil itself. This is a worm that immigrated, I presume you might say, from India to Egypt, and through the dissemination of Egyptian cotton it has spread into all parts of the world except North America, and the department had not discovered, as I said a moment ago, until November of last year that it had reached North America and was now present in the cotton of Mexico. It has also been discovered that from the infected region in Mexico there has come into Texas probably 400 tons of cotton seed——

Mr. HAWLEY. Five hundred carloads.

Mr. LEVER. Four hundred carloads of cotton seed, which are being ground and pressed by the Texas cotton-oil mills. The purpose of this proposal here is to enable the department not only to quarantine against further importations of cotton or cotton seed from Mexico so as to make a quarantine against Egypt, India, and the balance of the world, but at the same time to give authority to supervise and clean up all the cotton-seed oil concerns into which these infected seed have gone. It is not certain, by any means, that the seed are infected, but they come from an infected district, and the seriousness of the situation is so great that the department felt and the committee unanimously felt that we ought not to take any risks with it; and therefore we submitted it in this shape. Of course I realize it is subject to the point of order, but I hope the gentleman will not press it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman acknowledges it is a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not question the exigency or character of the condition requiring the attention of the Department of Agriculture, but we have a committee on appropriations which brings in deficiency bills from time to time carrying emergency appropriations, and I do not question but what if the case is exigent and if the matter is presented to the Committee on Appropriations, as the communication in reference to this matter has been so referred, that it would be embodied in the next emergency deficiency bill, which bill will very likely become a law before this bill is enacted into law. Therefore I make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the point of order made on the whole paragraph?

Mr. STAFFORD. On the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Demonstrations on reclamation projects: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage and aid in the agricultural development of the Government reclamation projects; to assist, through demonstrations, advice, and in other ways, settlers on the projects; and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $40,000.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said in the last few months on this floor and elsewhere relative to the dairies and creameries of this country, and resolutions galore have been introduced and statements have been made of the evidence that the Rules Committee of this House developed. I desire to read what the evidence before the Rules Committee last April did develop, and was uncontradicted, relative to the dairy and creamery interests of the United States.

First. That in dairy States of the Union there are, many of recent origin, but all working at this time, effective laws governing the supervision and inspection of dairies and creameries, and in practically every case the laws are being effectively enforced.

Second. That of the commercial dairy products more than 60 per cent are pasteurized and that pasteurization is steadily increasing in every part of the country.

Third. That the large majority of dairy and creamery products which enter into interstate commerce, we believe amounting to 75 per cent, is pasteurized.

Fourth. We are convinced that no industry in this country having to do with the production and handling of human food has made an advancement in purity and sanitation equal to that of dairy and creamery products during the last five years.

Fifth. That the state of purity and wholesomeness of commercial creamery and dairy products in this country is farther advanced than almost any country in the world.

I have quoted from the undisputed testimony of William T. Creasy, secretary of the National Dairy Union of the United States.

There are 46,000 creameries and cream stations in the United States. Five years ago the Department of Agriculture took up an investigation and sent two or three untried young men into 6 States, which 6 States out of the 48 the Department of Agriculture has not vouchsafed a statement. Information as to which of those creameries and dairy stations were examined was refused the people interested in a statement. A classification of the various stations and creameries examined was denied the dairy people of the United States, but it was admitted that of the 144 examined a good many of them were condemned because they were not painted on the outside, and that there were not proper walks around the outside.

Out of the multiplied millions of bodies of cream from the creameries in this country during the investigation they examined 1,500. Upon these, five years ago, they practically condemned the dairy and creamery interests of this country and made it the basis for investigations, and frequent charges made upon the floor of this House. Reiterated unwarranted attacks have been made against one of the leading industries of the United States and the most important industry in the matter of preserving and conserving the fertility of our soil.

Now, then, reference was made the other day by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] to the dairy interests and the alleged bad condition of the industry in this country. I notice that just a short time ago over in the city of Baltimore the National Federation of Labor was induced to adopt a resolution, of which I shall read one of the paragraphs of the preamble, as follows:

Whereas a hearing was had on House resolution 137 on April 11, 1916, before the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, at which time Dr. E. C. Schroeder, expert bacteriologist of the Department of Agriculture, stated to the committee that 300 children die annually in New York City of bovine tuberculosis, and on this basis the annual death rate in the United States from bovine tuberculosis is 6,000 children every year, and further said that over 9 per cent, or 2,000,000, of our dairy cows have tuberculosis and are capable of transmitting that disease to children; while Dr. John R. Mohler, Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, told the committee that he had personally examined the bodies of a number of children who died of tuberculosis and found that over 22 per cent had died from bovine tuberculosis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read to the committee the evidence upon which that very sweeping statement was made. Beginning on page 23, of the hearings before the Rules Committee, I read:

A few years ago, basing an estimate on the available data of the kind supplied by the New York health office, a tuberculosis expert in Canada—

Not in the United States, but an expert in Canada—

whose paper was afterwards published in the transactions of the Canadian Tuberculosis Association, estimated that there were annually about 400 deaths from bovine tuberculosis in Canada. If we take the population of Canada and compare it with the population of New York City, the figures compare about as 4 for Canada and 3 for New York. On the basis of similar data it has been estimated that approximately 300 deaths from bovine tuberculosis occur annually in New York City, and this again gives the ratio of 4 and 3, and since New York City has about one-twentieth of the population of the United States, we have simply to multiply the 300 deaths from bovine tuberculosis per annum in New York City by 20 to get an approximate idea of the number of deaths from bovine tuberculosis in the United States, and this gives us rather a large number.

Now, that is what Dr. Schroeder said and that is the evidence upon which the sweeping charge was made by the great Federation of Labor. Its committee on resolutions evidently had been imposed upon by some one as to what the hearings actually contained. That is an estimate not based upon any investigation. But solely upon one man's estimate that 400 people died in Canada during the year from bovine tuberculosis, and that Canada has one-third more people than the city of New York. Therefore 300 infants died of bovine tuberculosis in New York in one year, and New York City being one-twentieth of the United States, the total for the country would be 6,000, the number given in the resolution, which is one of the most remarkable pieces of logic, and one of the most winding exhibitions of ratiocination of which I ever heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I will not object if the gentleman will yield for a couple of questions.

Mr. SLOAN. What are your questions?

Mr. LINTHICUM. You have not been granted the time yet.

Mr. SLOAN. I asked it. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not. I merely ask you if you will answer a couple of question of mine?

Mr. SLOAN. I am not making any advance agreement.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to hear what the gentleman has to say, and I do not object to it. If you want to excuse this tuberculosis in cattle, go ahead and do it. I have no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. I am not excusing tuberculosis in cattle. I am opposed to tuberculosis remaining in this country. I must insist, however, that no Member of this House has a right to attack a great industry like the dairy industry of this country unless he has something on which to base it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wish I could give you two other minutes for a better purpose than your excuse for tuberculosis in cattle which you are trying to give.

Mr. SLOAN. I am not taking my time from the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman from Maryland or somebody else induced the federation to place itself in this further attitude of indorsing the testimony of one Dr. Mohler, who is described as telling the committee that he had personally examined the bodies of a number of children who died of tuberculosis and found that over 22 per cent had died of bovine tuberculosis. Why was not the federation's committee told that Mohler had examined only nine cases, each of them right up against Maryland, and that two of them seemed to have been due to bovine tuberculosis? The statement as it stands gives the public to understand that a general country-wide investigation had been made, involving so many cases that it had to be reduced to percentages in order to be grasped by the ordinary mind. In order to make it sound harsh and horrible it was put in percentage. This is the evidence of Dr. Mohler. He says:

My information is based on personal work in the laboratory, and consists of, first, the investigation of nine children that died of tuberculosis, and as a result of the study of the bacilli found in the bodies of these nine children definite and positive results were obtained from two of these cases indicating that the bovine tubercle bacillus was the responsible factor in producing death.

That was here at Washington.

I do not know who had the charm or the magnetism that led that great national organization to take up a great subject of this kind, and, instead of giving the precise fact, said 22 per cent. But here he had examined only nine cases, and instead of saying that two out of nine were traceable through some manner or means, we know not how, to bovine sources, gave it in percentage. Why, you can prove that one swallow makes a summer by the same brilliant logic.

Mr. CANNON. They are very modest in that statement.

Mr. SLOAN. Now, if the gentleman desires to ask me those questions.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; I want to ask the gentleman whether he read from the report issued by the Agricultural Department in reference to tuberculosis among cattle?

Mr. SLOAN. I did.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And did the gentleman notice that by the department figures there are about 2,000,000 of these cattle in this country?

Mr. SLOAN. I know that the distinguished Dr. Schroeder, who is quoted as authority by the gentleman from Maryland and is quoted as authority by the American Federation of Labor, testified five or six years ago that 22 per cent of the dairy cattle of the United States were afflicted with tuberculosis. Since that time he has modified his testimony and gives to the country now the information that only 9 per cent are thus afflicted.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is about 10 per cent.

Mr. SLOAN. I am correct. See page 25, hearings, testimony of Dr. Schroeder. And then he goes on to say that this change is based on the fact that when he estimated it at 22 per cent he was taking into consideration largely the cattle in the eastern part of the United States, I suppose in and around Maryland. [Laughter.] But having taken into account the cattle of all the country, and not leaving out those in the sacred precincts of Maryland, he found that with respect to the cattle which furnished largely the commercial milk, butter, and cheese for the people of the United States he had to reduce it from 22 per cent to 9 per cent. Now, if my mathematics are on straight, it would leave the larger portion of the tuberculous cattle to the States in the neighborhood of the gentleman from Maryland.

You know how they kept the streets of Jerusalem so clean in the ancient time, as the Scotchman said, "By every man keeping his ain front door clean"; and if the farmers represented by the gentleman from Maryland and thereabouts would do what the great creamery and dairy States of the Northwest have been doing during the last few years, namely, cleaning up their creameries and dairies and purifying their herds, they would be giving to the people in and outside of Maryland and neighboring States pure butter, milk, and cream, and the gentleman from Maryland would not have so much to say against a great legitimate industry of the United States whose product amounts to one billion annually. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman could say all he knows about it in one minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. I could not do that.

Mr. SLOAN. I think the gentleman could, according to his way of estimating percentages. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert a new paragraph. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARNER:

"That the act of August 30, 1890, entitled 'An act providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes' (26 Stat. L., p. 414), is hereby amended so as to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture, within his discretion and under such joint resolution as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury, to permit the admission of tick-infested cattle from Mexico into those parts of the United States below the southern cattle quarantine line at such ports of entry as may be designated by said joint regulations, and also subject to the provisions of sections 7, 8, 9, and 10 of said act of August 30, 1890. That all such cattle when entered shall be subject to the regulations governing the handling and transportation of cattle from the districts infected with the splenetic fever."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LEVER. I wonder if the gentleman from Maryland would not let us read the next paragraph before he moves to strike out the last word?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cooperative fire protection of forested watersheds of navigable streams: For cooperation with any State or group of States in the protection from fire of the forested watersheds of navigable streams under the provisions of section 2 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," $100,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am extremely sorry that the gentleman from Nebraska waxes so warm about this dairy question. It might be very well to keep the country clean according to the rules that he says existed some thousands of years ago in Jerusalem, by each man keeping his own front door clean, provided that would work. But that will not work in the dairy industry at this time. There was a time when it might have worked, when the dairies were small, and when the products came from immediate surrounding country and were sold in the immediate neighborhood. But in these times, when rapid trains carry these products from Wisconsin and Michigan and Minnesota and other States to Baltimore and to the whole country, and when cold storage can be used during the transportation of such products throughout the world, the question of keeping your own front door clean will not work. I contend that while the pasteurization of milk is all right, and that you can keep milk pure by that means, it is useless to try to contend that tuberculosis can be gotten rid of in that way when the infection can just as easily be communicated by means of meat; and why should we be subject to infection from diseased cattle when we can get rid of the diseased cattle at little cost?

Now, the gentleman must know this, because I assume he is a farmer—in fact, I know he is a farmer——

Mr. SLOAN. I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. You stand accredited as being a farmer. Good.

Mr. SLOAN. I stand complimented. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; complimented that the gentleman is a farmer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can certify that he is a farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Pennsylvania certifies that he is a farmer. It needs no proof. But the fact is you could have a cow on your farm, could be selling the milk to a dairy without inspection, and it might go into the butter, and thus be taken into the homes of the children of this country without inspection—in many of the States without pasteurization. Again, if that cow reached the stage where it was too old to produce profitable milk any further and you wanted to send it to the slaughterhouse, the Government official would condemn it, and it would at once be converted into fertilizer.

Now, why should you go on producing cattle and milk which go into the stomachs of the children of this country in that raw state when the Government would not allow that it should go into the children's stomachs in a cooked state? You want pasteurization as a last resort, but what we want to do is to get rid of the cattle themselves.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] stated the other day that it would cost $210,000,000 to get rid of these tuberculous cattle.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Let me make my statement first.

Mr. HAUGEN. Just one brief statement. That was the statement made by the representative of the department.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That it would cost $210,000,000?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; about $600,000,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes. The gentleman bases that upon cattle which are healthy.

Mr. HAUGEN. I base it upon 10 per cent of the dairy cows and 8 per cent of the other cows.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; cows that are healthy. But suppose the gentleman would take these tuberculous cows that he is talking about and would attempt to sell them for meat purposes. What would happen? They would be condemned instantly and turned into fertilizer.

Mr. HAUGEN. Only the infected parts.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, there would not be much left of a tuberculous cow that anyone would want to eat.

Now, I do not want to get too warm about this legislation. The American Federation of Labor are interested in it, as they are interested in many things which need attention. They are interested in protecting the homes and lives of the working classes of this country. They are interested in protecting those people who can not always get the finest milk and the finest butter and the finest cream that the country produces. They are interested in the poor man, who needs protection at the hands of this Congress, and that is why the workingman is interested in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, to allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman will not ask that. We want to get on with the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not ask for any extension.

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LEVER. Let the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Experiments and demonstrations in live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned, or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States, including the erection of barns and other necessary buildings, and the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $60,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I assume that this is the item that was originally introduced in order to take care of the cane-sugar planters of Louisiana when the Underwood tariff bill, containing the free-sugar item, was passed.

Mr. LEVER. This is a matter that was introduced by the gentleman from Louisana [Mr. BROUSSARD] who is now a Senator. It was offered as an amendment and inserted on the floor of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the reason advanced for making the special exception?

Mr. LEVER. I do not remember the statement that was made in connection with it. It was some three or four years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite suprised that the gentleman does not remember everything in connection with this bill. He does not seem to in this one instance.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is the only man who always remembers everything.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will not accept that statement.

Mr. LEVER. It is intended as a compliment.

Mr. STAFFORD. No compliment. It is mere idle palaver. The gentleman is certainly acquainted with the purpose of this item.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I am.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the original purpose is at an end, why is it continued in the bill any longer?

Mr. LEVER. This item was inserted in the bill—if the gentleman is serious about it——

Mr. STAFFORD. I am entirely serious.

Mr. LEVER. I thought the gentleman was jocular.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not take up the time of the committee unless I was serious in calling attention to the uselessness of carrying the item in the bill after the purpose for which it was inserted has passed.

Mr. LEVER. This item was inserted in the bill on the floor of the House at the suggestion of Representative BROUSSARD, who has now become a Member of the Senate. It was debated here for quite a little while, as the gentleman will recall. I am inclined to think—to be perfectly frank, as I was in a humorous frame of mind a moment ago—that the author of that amendment did have in mind the idea of helping the cane-sugar growers of his own State. I will say very frankly also that my own view was at that time and is now that the investigations conducted under this item are very much larger than the problems that relate peculiarly to the cane growers of Louisiana. It is really a kind of an experiment station in that section of the country, and the work so far, I think, has been satisfactory to every member of the committee. Whether or not it was wise to start it in the beginning is a matter over which the committee had very little control, because, as I said, it came in as an amendment on the floor of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. It only shows that when once a work is undertaken by the Government——

Mr. LEVER. It is very hard to get rid of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. No matter whether the original purpose is accomplished or not, it goes on forever.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have a recollection of this item, which has been in the bill for several years, and think I can enlighten the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] who seeks information on the subject. Perhaps I can tell him what he wishes to know. My recollection is that after the low-tariff law went into effect there was quite a depreciation in the sugar business in Louisiana. In fact, in anticipation of losses due to the Democrats having come into power in the Nation, threatening a low-tariff law that would work havoc all over the good old Democratic State of Louisiana, it was suggested that a little help from Congress—not in the way of a tariff, which the Democrats detest, and charge up only to the manufacturing industries—a little help from Congress by way of developing live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts—which meant in this instance only Louisiana—might be a good thing for Louisiana. And so, of course, without regard to any special favors to anybody, and with face front against the "special interests," this item of $60,000 was introduced into this bill in order that our friends in Louisiana who suffered loss by reason of the Democratic policy of free trade and the destruction of the sugar industry in Louisiana might recoup to a certain extent. The idea was that, to the extent of $60,000, barns and other necessary buildings might be erected and certain men employed in the redevelopment of the sugar-cane business, and so forth.

Now, this sort of back-handed assistance has been given in other instances. The other day, when this same bill was under consideration, we inquired about appropriations for pursuing the Canadian potato scab or wart. An embargo against the potato wart was put on by the administration some time after the Democratic Party, following out its policy of free trade, had put potatoes on the free list. There had come over from Canada such a tremendous avalanche of potatoes, competing with the product of Maine, that the error of the Democratic Party was at once apparent. The Democratic administration did not restore the duty, but it put on an embargo that was more effective than the war in Europe in keeping Canadian potatoes out of this country. That might have restrained the farmers of Maine from voting against the Democratic Party, but it did not.

I would like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to understand thoroughly, since he seems to seek light on the subject, just why these things are put in here once in a while, to remedy some of the errors of the Democratic Party. They help to reassure the people that while Democracy stands for free trade in theory, in reality they are for protection in fact, even if it requires an appropriation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Canadian potato scab has done more for the potato farmer of America than the Democratic Party has done for him?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course. Immediately when these Canadian potatoes came rushing over the border under the free-trade policy of the Democratic Party there was nothing to do to save the vote in Maine except to put on the embargo against Canadian potatoes.

Mr. BORLAND. Can the gentleman tell us where these potatoes are now that have been rushing in over the border in such a flood?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes; under the European war conditions and the Democratic method of reducing the high cost of living they have reached as high as $2 a bushel to the ordinary consumer. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter, for the purpose of reducing the expense of enforcing and administering the several statutes conferring powers or imposing duties upon the Secretary of Agriculture, he shall have authority from time to time to make designations of officers, agents, and employees of the Department of Agriculture to administer oaths, of which designations the courts of the United States shall take judicial notice. Any such officer, agent, or employee so designated is hereby empowered to administer to, or take from, any person an oath, affirmation, or affidavit whenever such oath, affirmation, or affidavit is for use in any prosecution or proceeding under, or in the administration of, any law which the Secretary of Agriculture or the Department of Agriculture, or any bureau or subdivision thereof, is, or may hereafter be, empowered or directed to administer or to aid in administering. Any such oath, affirmation, or affidavit administered or taken by or before such officer, agent, or employee, when certified under his hand and authenticated by the official seal of the Department of Agriculture, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, and when offered or used in any court of the United States shall have like force and effect as if administered or taken by or before the clerk of such court, without further proof of the identity or authority of such officer, agent, or employee. No officer, agent, or employee of the Department of Agriculture shall demand or accept any fee or compensation whatsoever for administering or taking any oath, affirmation, or affidavit under the authority conferred by this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. This paragraph apparently confers a very large authority upon the innumerable employees and agents connected with the Department of Agriculture scattered all over the country. A casual reading of the paragraph will show that summary power is conferred upon them. It is possible that it may be abused, and I think the chairman is called upon to make some explanation of the need of it.

Mr. LEVER. I will try to do it briefly. This matter was introduced in the form of a bill and referred to the subcommittee, of which I was not a member. The statement that is made to the committee is that the new language is desired in order to decrease the cost of preparing cases for prosecution and to eliminate to a considerable extent the difficulty now experienced in getting these cases into court. I will read:

The necessity of this measure may well be illustrated by the procedure in connection with the enforcement of the food and drugs act. The proceedings are criminal under section 2 of the act and civil under section 10. Most of the criminal cases are prosecuted by information rather than by indictment, as such method seems expeditious and economical. In all cases prosecuted by information, affidavits showing probable cause for the prosecution are required of witnesses having personal knowledge of the facts. At least two affidavits are usually necessary for each case. Affidavits also frequently are required by the courts in seizure proceedings under section 10 of the act, where no claimant appears and it is necessary for the Government to proceed ex parte to secure a decree of condemnation. Such affidavits are taken in all parts of the United States, and the notarial fees range from 25 cents to $1.

Probably the most important consideration in favor of the enactment of this paragraph is the fact that in many places where samples are purchased the only officers authorized to administer oaths whose certificates can be obtained are State officers, such as notaries public and justices of the peace, and their official acts and seals are not always recognized by the Federal courts. For instance, in the case of the United States v. Schallinger Produce Co. (230 Fed. Rep., 290), decided in 1914, in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Washington, Judge Rudkin refused to accept affidavits subscribed and sworn to before notaries public and dismissed the Government's information on the ground that it was not supported by oath or affirmation. (See also U. S. v. Baumert et al., 179 Fed. Rep., 735.)

Since the publication of the decision in the Schallinger case many affidavits sworn to before notaries public have been returned to the department for reexecution before a clerk of a Federal court or a United States commissioner. This has seriously interfered with the efficient administration of the act, to say nothing of the increase in the cost of its administration and the unreasonable delay in bringing cases to trial. Unless relief from this situation is afforded by Congress, the universal application of Judge Rudkin's decision in all the Federal courts will seriously interfere with the enforcement of Federal statutes and greatly increase the cost of obtaining evidence of violations of law.

It is to obviate that situation that this language is inserted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that there ought to be some restrictions in conferring this authority on every one connected with the Agricultural Department, field agents and all, so as not to permit them to go into a neighbor's or a stranger's home and say, "I am an agent of the Department of Agriculture, authorized to acquire information under the Bureau of Markets, and I ask you to give me the information desired"?

Mr. LEVER. I am willing to accept such an amendment. I am perfectly willing that this should go out on a point of order. I do not care much about it one way or the other, for it may be better to handle it in a separate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think perhaps there is some need of such legislation, but I do not think that this can be amended satisfactorily on the spur of the moment. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Borland: Page 86, line 25, insert "that no part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries, or for personal services in any department, bureau, or office in the District of Columbia which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day except from technical and scientific experts."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention again at this time to the fact that the Government is wasting a great deal of the money it appropriates, particularly in the executive departments in the city of Washington. I want to call attention to the fact that a special privilege or favoritism exists in the departments at Washington by which employees work less than the full standard day of eight hours, and by which they have an unusual and undue number of leaves of absence and holidays. When I say unusual and undue, I mean compared with the great mass of civil-service employees throughout the country, as well as the great mass of private employees. I think it will be a matter of surprise to the farmers interested in this bill, and expecting the money appropriated to be expended in the most efficient way, to learn that the clerks of Washington only work seven hours a day, or an average of 208 days out of 365. We owe it, I think, to the farmers of this country, as well as to all other taxpayers, to see that the activities of the Government are expended and attended to in every helpful way; and in order to do so, I think we are entitled also to demand a dollar's worth of work for every dollar expended. The men who are asked to pay the taxes in this country almost uniformly work a minimum of eight hours a day. In fact, a large number of men, taxpayers, are still demanding and hoping to get their working time reduced to eight hours a day.

The farmer has never been allowed to work less than eight hours a day. Conditions do not permit it. The great mass of private employees are not permitted to work only eight hours a day, those who consider themselves in a favored and specially protected class; but here we have a class who live off the taxes, who are paid off the taxes collected from these wage-workers and the producers of the Nation, who work only seven hours a day. The net result of that is a loss of $5,000,000 of the people's money in administering the Government in Washington. Not all of it is involved in this bill. This is one of the bills providing for a part of the executive departments in Washington. But this matter must be corrected in several different bills, of which this is one, and this bill illustrates more clearly than any other the indefensible contrast between the hours of labor of the man who pays the taxes and the hours of labor of those who are paid out of the taxes. What is the net result? The net result is that we employ an undue number of clerks and employees in Washington to accomplish the Government work. We hire too many people, and as we increase the activities of the Government—and we do it in each bill—we are increasing the evil, because every time we appropriate any money for any expenditure in the city of Washington we do it upon the theory that we only get 80 cents on the dollar for every dollar of money expended in the city of Washington for labor. The farmers might just as well understand that their dollar is cut to an 80-cent dollar the minute it is put into the Agricultural bill, and if they do understand that, and want it done, that is their business, because they pay the bills; but my observation is that we do not want it done. The farmer who pays the taxes and who demands these activities from the Government to permit him to increase the production out of which he pays the taxes, will also demand and insist upon having a fair return for the Federal money expended in his behalf.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Presently. We will not be able to deceive the farmer by saying that this is the result of a custom. To say that it is the result of a custom is simply to say that it is a vested wrong, because if it is a custom that does not make it right. Because it has been done in the past is no reason why we should continue it. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know if the gentleman can tell us about the percentage of Federal taxes that the farmer pays?

Mr. BORLAND. That would be very difficult. There are a great many good economists who figure out that the farmer practically supports the country. In other words, that all men who engage in other occupations—manufacturing, transportation, distribution—are a part of the pyramid of which the farmer is the base. Gentlemen will understand that we can not argue that proposition; but if the farmer only paid a very small portion of the tax, he is entitled to honesty and justice in the expenditure of that tax. I think it is easily correct to say that the farmer pays in the aggregate, directly and indirectly, 50 to 55 per cent of the taxes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If this amendment should be adopted just as it is proposed by the gentleman, does he not think that the people in these offices would simply be kept there for an additional length of time and that neither this bill nor any other would probably be one penny less than it is now? We would simply compel somebody to stay there a little longer than they otherwise would stay.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think so. I have heard the argument that these clerks, even if you kept them there for eight hours, would not do any more work than they do now. I think that is a reflection upon the great mass of clerks. They are supposed to give a certain amount of labor, and I know if they are there for eight hours a day they ought to perform a larger volume of labor per unit than they do now. In other words, it would take fewer clerks to discharge the public business; and if it took fewer clerks, it would take less office space and less supplies, less rent in the District of Columbia, and everything would be upon a smaller basis. The larger number of people we employ the more office space we must have for them, and it all inures simply to the benefit of the community of Washington, where the money is expended. It is utterly opposed to the interest of the communities of the United States where the money is raised. When we come to consider that we are about to raise some more money, that we are not looking for places to expend money or to waste it, but are looking for places to raise money to run the Federal Government, we realize that some retrenchment and reform is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BORLAND) there were—ayes 19, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for all persons employed under the Department of Agriculture, including on the lump-sums rolls only those persons who are carried thereon at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate per annum less than $1,200, and increased compensation at a rate of 5 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate of not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, so much as may be necessary is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation provided by this section shall not apply to persons whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, or whose services are needed for brief periods at intervals, or to any persons who receive a part of their salaries or wages from any outside sources under cooperative arrangements with the Department of Agriculture: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I want to get some information first from the chairman, if he can give it to me. How many employees of this department will be affected by this provision?

Mr. LEVER. There will be about 12,000 employees affected by this provision.

Mr. COX. And at how much of a total cost?

Mr. LEVER. Of about $900,000.

Mr. COX. Nearly $1,000,000.

Mr. LEVER. Nearly a million dollars.

Mr. COX. I will have to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands it will come in under the rule?

Mr. COX. I know there is a rule, but the rule does not make this particular provision palatable.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit, I will say a rule was passed making this identical language in order on the bill, and it will save time not to press the point of order. I am prepared to offer it in the identical language.

Mr. COX. I would rather have the amendment offered in the same language; I do not care if it is torn out of the bill and offered. I make the point of order on it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Following page 86, as a new paragraph:

"That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for all persons employed under the Department of Agriculture, including on the lump-sum rolls only those persons who are carried thereon at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate per annum less than $1,200, and increased compensation at a rate of 5 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate of not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, so much as may be necessary is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation provided by this section shall not apply to persons whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, or whose services are needed for brief periods at intervals, or to any persons who receive a part of their salaries or wages from any outside sources under cooperative arrangements with the Department of Agriculture: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think so important an amendment ought to be voted upon without some discussion, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, before commencing I desire to say that I recognize now the futility of opposing this amendment at this time. The Committee on Appropriations has inserted this language in the legislative bill. The Indian bill has already reached the Senate and the proposition now is to insert it there. On a point of order made by myself this language went out of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, but the proposition is to restore it in the Senate, and now, following the precedent set by the Committee on Appropriations, this amendment, contrary to the law of the land, made in order by this special rule, is presented.

I desire to say that I approve of collective bargaining. I approve of these increases granted throughout the land in our manufacturing establishments, which are realizing profits unheard of before in the history of this country. The men who labor there and who contribute their share, and more than their share, toward making these enormous profits possible are entitled to the bonuses and the increases of salaries granted to them, to which reference is so frequently made. They are receiving a part of the money they have earned, and their organizations, their methods of collective bargaining, have made this possible. These conditions are imposed, and are properly imposed, upon a business which is paying.

The principal argument used for these increases of salaries of Government employees is that in the industries throughout the land wages are being increased, and we are face to face for the first time in the history of this Nation with organizations of Government employees, and so far as I am advised no such economic condition as that has ever prevailed in any nation since the morning stars sang together. These organizations of Government employees have been arranged for what purpose? Why, for no known purpose in the world except the purpose of increasing their salaries—indulging in collective bargaining against the Treasury of the United States; 500,000 of them are dancing in wild ghost dances about the Treasury of the United States. We have had nothing like it in the history of nations since the dancing mania of the Middle Ages. They are demanding these increases in their salaries; they are demanding these bonuses from a business that is not paying the stockholders one cent. We are face to face now with additional bond issues. This Congress—and irrespective of party, all voted for this measure—has voted bonds for a merchant marine to the amount of $50,000,000, bonds for a nitrate plant to the amount of $20,000,000, and you will be called upon to vote bonds very soon for the purchase of the West Indies to the amount of $25,000,000. We will also soon be called upon in all probability to vote bonds for the Alaska Railway amounting to $21,000,000, and for maintaining the Army on the Mexican border $16,000,000. In other words, one year from now the stockholders of this Government will have placed a mortgage on their property of $280,000,000 in addition to the national debt already existing. That is not all. We are going to be called upon to find new revenues to the amount of $200,000,000, and that must be done at once, and this does not include the amount which will be needed to meet the demands of the salary grab now in progress, which it is now evident will reach almost $80,000,000, if the Government employees have their way about it. You are probably conceding them in these supply bills nearly $40,000,000. We are therefore about to be called upon to provide by new taxes the amount of at least $250,000,000.

This is the condition which confronts the Nation, and at this time this collective bargaining, comprising the greatest salary grab ever known in the history of this Nation, is participated in all the way down the line. One reason given for it is that their salaries have not been increased for over half a century. This amendment provides that these increases shall apply only to the approaching fiscal year. But who ever heard of the salary of a Government employee being lowered? Whenever they are fixed, they are fixed forever. What is the argument which supports this collective bargaining against the Treasury of the United States, which you seem to approve of here by such a tremendous majority whenever the question comes up as these bills progress through the House? Why, it simply amounts to this: They can, now that they are organized, place the black hand of their disapproval upon that Member of Congress who is courageous enough to call attention to these outrageous salary increases. Unscientific? Why, of course they are. Are these men entitled to 5 and 10 per cent increase? Some of them are; most of them are not. And yet you provide this horizontal method of doing it. When this matter first came up the statement was made on the floor here by members of the Committee on Appropriations that this would mean an increase of $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 in the annual expenses of this Government if it was carried through all the bills. It has developed now, and your attention will be called to it soon on this floor, that if this increase is carried in the Post Office bill, the next bill that comes up, it will mean an increase in that bill alone to employees affected by it of $16,000,000. Therefore the proposition that $25,000,000 covers it all is nonsense. It will not cover it. And even the huge amount you are giving them does not satisfy the appetites of these Government employees, as they have announced through their organizations here in Washington—here is where most of the money comes; here is where 42,000 of them live; and they all announce that they are not satisfied with the large increase you are giving them.

They propose to carry this fight on to the Senate, and they propose to insist there, not on this increase, which they say means nothing, but they propose to insist there on increases of 10 and 20 per cent, twice as much as this. And a careful analysis of their demand will show that this may mean an increase in the expenses of this Government of over $80,000,000 every year.

The newspapers in Washington, without exception, favor this raid on the Treasury. In fact, I have never seen or read an item in a Washington newspaper advocating economy when the city of Washington was interested. The only industry they have here in Washington is the industry of running this Government, and these newspapers, every one of them, stand for all sorts of extravagance, providing it means the spending of more money here in the hotels and in the department stores and other places of business. At the present time the newspapers of Washington are engaged in a controversy as to which newspaper is entitled to the credit for this raid on the Treasury, which they expect will soon be successful. I hold here in my hand an editorial from a Washington newspaper, which I will read in part, and will insert the remainder of it in the RECORD, with the permission of the House, which I will soon request. This is the article; it appeared on the first page of yesterday's Washington Herald:

EDITORIAL.

"Yesterday the Evening Star, with a brave display of a full page of cartoons, directed attention to the fact that it has been waging a "battle for the Government clerks' welfare for over a half century."

The Star is to be commended for any interest it has shown for the United States Government employees covering so long a period of time. Its endeavor, however, was but the duplication of similar efforts of at least two of the other three Washington newspapers, which fail to date back for a period "over half a century" simply because of the fact that the history of their existence is of lesser length.

For "over half a century" the newspapers of Washington have from time to time given liberally of their space to the United States Government employees and their needs.

But it remained for the Washington Herald to realize the psychology of the moment to gather around it those citizens of the District, United States Government employees, labor leaders, and all others interested in fair play, and on November 20, 1916, inaugurate in its news and editorial columns a campaign which for rapidity of results has astounded even the most ardent supporters of the movement.

Several days later the Evening Star favored the movement with a very commendable editorial and an appropriate cartoon, and there appeared on the same day a leading editorial in another Washington paper along the same line.

From the first day until the end of the campaign the Washington Herald kept at its work in its news columns, with cartoons and editorially, collecting statistics on salary raises the country over, the increased cost of living, the opinions of people of importance, in and outside the Government, etc., setting them forth clearly in the columns of the paper, until one of its contemporaries (which it is but fair to state was not the Evening Star) published some very valuable statistics, and not until nearly a week later, or on November 30, to be exact, did the Evening Star again open its columns to the subject of the immediate need and justness of the cause.

If any newspaper is to be credited with the increases in salaries which we believe are about to be granted to the Government employees, data on file in the Washington Herald office and clippings of every article, editorial, and cartoon that has appeared recently in all of the Washington newspapers indicate that the Washington Herald has accomplished in about two months what the Evening Star has been "fighting" for for "over half a century."

But the Washington Herald has no desire to mar by any attempt at glory grabbing so worthy a cause as the endeavor to obtain for the United States Government clerks a compensation in proportion to the importance of the work they do, based upon present-day salary standards.

Again, we say the moment was psychological, and the only credit the Washington Herald takes unto itself is that it was the one paper in Washington to appreciate this fact and to utilize it by bringing to the attention of a very busy but responsive Congress of a prosperous country the fact that we are at a time when the largest employer in the United States should recognize an 1854 salary basis to be absolutely obsolete.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. These positions can be filled, every one of them, in a week's time as well as they are filled now by competent young men and women to be selected from the various States of this Union. In the old days, in the old spoils days, when these salaries were fixed they were fixed exorbitantly high, and it was known then that they were, but the country then, under the old spoils system which prevailed, was absolutely defenseless. And to-day these salaries are higher, averaging $1,200 per year, than is paid young men and young women in other similar avocations in private life; and that matter you do not even investigate. I hold here in my hand, and I will put some of these advertisements in the RECORD, a single column from one of these newspapers circulating among Government employees, in which there occurs eight advertisements of correspondence schools, advising young men and young women that if they take a particular course they can qualify themselves for these numerous desirable Government positions, 400,000 of them, and, more than that, in which vacancies are constantly occurring.

Business colleges were unknown in this country when these salaries were fixed so long ago. They are numerous now, and there is a business college in every town or city of any size in the United States in addition to these correspondence schools for preparing young men and women for this character of employment, keeping accounts, keeping books, and so forth. And they go out, thousands and thousands of them every year, and accept less salaries than are given Government clerks here in the city of Washington and throughout this land, and render service for, not 7 hours a day, as they do here, but 9 hours a day and 10 hours a day.

Keeping in mind the fact that these Government positions pay an average of $100 a month, I want to read some of the enticing advertisements which appear in the paper I hold in my hand. An institution in Rochester, N. Y., advertises as follows:

Wanted young men as railway mail clerks, $75 a month; sample examination questions free.

Another correspondence school in New York advertises as follows:

Thousands of Government jobs now obtainable, $75 a month; list free.

Another institution advertises—

Railway mail clerks wanted, $75 a month; sample examination questions free.

Another civil-service school advertises as follows:

Get prepared for rural carrier, fourth-class postmaster, post office, railway mail, and other Government examinations by a former United States civil-service secretary examiner. Descriptive booklet free without obligation. Write to-day.

Another advertisement reads as follows:

Railway mail, post office, and other Government positions are good. Prepared for "exams" under former Government examiner. Booklet free. Write to-day.

Another civil-service school, located here in Washington, advertises in this same paper as follows:

We prepare you and you get a position or we guarantee to refund your money. Write for book telling about Government positions with lifetime employment, short hours, sure pay, regular vacations.

I have only read a part of these advertisements and you can find them in almost any newspaper. The opportunity to obtain these Government positions attracts 180,000 people every year. There are twenty times as many applicants as there are jobs. The salaries themselves are attractive. Half holidays on Saturdays, 30 days sick leave every year at full pay, 30 days vacation every year at full pay, only seven hours a day work if you are assigned to duty here in Washington, insurance policies free, the absolute certainty that you will be retained when advanced in years, the prospect of being retired after 25 years' service at half pay or two-thirds pay; these are the alluring features which bring every year an army of applicants for the few vacancies which occur. These are desirable positions, the most desirable positions of their class, and we are rushing blindly here into an expenditure which may exceed $80,000,000, because these employees for the first time in the history of the United States are organized and are indulging in collective bargaining against the Treasury. There may be at some period in the future another organization in this country, comprising nearly all of those who are not Government employees; an organization which may get the impression that you ought to represent it here, and this organization may include the voters in the United States who do not have Government jobs.

Now, a record vote will be had on this question. It is in a condition for a record vote, and you gentlemen on the Republican side who are charging us with extravagance will have the opportunity to go on record. [Applause.]

Not a Member of this House knows how much these proposed salary increases will add to the annual expenses of this Government. The matter has been carefully investigated, however, by the Post Office Department with reference to the effect it will have on the expenditures of that department alone. The next supply bill to come up will be the post-office bill and it will develop during the progress of that bill through the House that the increases which will be provided for also in that bill mean, in that department of the Government alone, an increase in the expenditures of $16,000,000 per year. Without a particle of investigation we blindly proceed granting these increases simply because you say all must be treated alike. The effect upon the Treasury of what we are doing does not seem to be considered in the least. The methods this House is adopting with reference to these increases would ruin any business enterprise in the world. Not a Member of this House would apply to his own private business the methods the great majority of you will soon approve as applied to the matter of running the Government of the United States, the greatest business in the world. You propose to be generous with money that does not belong to you. The editorial I have read from the Washington Herald indicates the influences to which Members of Congress are subjected here in the Capital City. The lack of patriotism which permeates these organizations of Government employees and the papers which so vigorously speak for them is a new and an alarming element in our national life. The number of Government employees is constantly increasing. The Government may be compelled to take over the railroads 10 years from now. If that unfortunate situation should develop, the Treasury of the United States would be absolutely at the mercy of Government employees. In fact, these organizations of Government employees almost place them now in control of the Treasury of the United States. You are voting these increases now without investigation and without knowing what the total will be in a considerable measure because you fear the effect of the organizations of Government employees which extend back into your districts. As far as this program has gone this raid upon the Treasury will mean, when it is completed, an amount equal to $4 or $5 per year for each head of a family in the United States. The farmers, 7,000,000 of them, upon whom you are placing this burden have an average income of less than $600 per year. They pay taxes on their holdings. The majority of these Government clerks pay no taxes. They simply collect their salaries and their salaries average twice as much as the average income of the American farmer. The farmer earns his income assisted by his family, all of them work, not 7 hours a day but 9 and 10 hours a day and sometimes more than that. These wealth producers back in your districts are entitled to some consideration when you are providing these new tax burdens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. SLOAN. And I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico and the gentleman from Nebraska make the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. COX. A division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. We are going to have a roll call.

Mr. COX. Then I withdraw that.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the committee do now rise, and that the bill be reported back to the House with the amendments, that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on the agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19359) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put that question in a minute. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; on the amendment increasing the salaries of the clerks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asks a separate vote on the amendment increasing the salaries of the clerks.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask for a separate vote on the Mann amendment, the amendment relating to the investigation into food prices by the Bureau of Markets.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands a separate vote on the Mann amendment. The Chair supposes there are several of them.

Mr. MANN. No; only one, on page 75.

The SPEAKER. On the amendment on page 75 relating to market manipulations. The Chair will put the others in gross. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first excepted amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment on page 86 of the bill, following line 26: That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for all persons employed by the Department of Agriculture——

Mr. MANN. That is not it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] demanded one about the salaries. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for all persons employed under the Department of Agriculture, including on the lump-sum rolls only those persons who are carried thereon at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate per annum less than $1,200, and increased compensation at a rate of 5 per cent per annum to such employees who receive salaries or wages from such department at a rate of not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, so much as may be necessary is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the increased compensation provided by this section shall not apply to persons whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, or whose services are needed for brief periods at intervals, or to any persons who receive a part of their salaries or wages from any outside sources under cooperative arrangements with the Department of Agriculture: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAINEY and Mr. COX demanded a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] both demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 13.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of this amendment will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 279, nays 33, answered "present" 1, not voting 120, as follows:

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma with Mr. WINSLOW.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The amendment is agreed to. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Amend, on page 75, after line 25, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"To make investigation relating to the production, transportation, storage, preparation, marketing, manufacture, and distribution of agricultural food products, including the extent, manner, and methods of any manipulation of the markets or control of the visible supply of such food products, or any of them, by any individuals, groups, associations, combinations, or corporations, $50,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BORLAND) there were 214 yeas and 14 nays.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not.

Mr. RUBEY. I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. RUBEY. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is any gentleman on the committee opposed to the bill? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], a member of the committee.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to strike out on page 58, lines from 11 to 18, inclusive, and report forthwith.

Mr. LEVER. On that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RUBEY moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture with the instructions to report the same back forthwith striking out the lines from 11 to 18, inclusive, on page 58, which read as follows: "For all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats. L., pp. 847 and 848), relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, and for cooperation with local authorities in the protection of migratory birds, and for necessary investigations connected therewith, $50,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOARD OF REGENTS SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 187, providing for filling a vacancy in the Board of Regents for the Smithsonian Institution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if this is agreeable to the Board of Regents?

Mr. LLOYD. It is.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress.

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress, caused by the resignation of Andrew D. White, of New York, be filled by the appointment of Henry White, a citizen of Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the Senate joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the joint resolution was passed.

IMMIGRATION BILL.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the immigration bill for printing under the rule, and I will give notice that on Thursday next immediately after reading the Journal I will call it up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 10384. An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States.

NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 186, authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversion of water from the Niagara River, and I ask unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 186, insist on the amendments of the House, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FLOOD, Mr. CLINE, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. The purpose of this is to give an opportunity to the Committee on Education to take up the vocational education bill and spend about two hours on it.

Mr. MANN. To be followed by the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; and then take up the rule for the Adamson resolution for the extension of the Newlands committee.

Mr. MANN. And then to be followed by the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan was given leave to withdraw papers and petitions on the files of the House, without leaving copies, in the case of Joseph Harrison, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LOBECK, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for two weeks, on account of illness.

REPORT OF THE NEWLANDS COMMITTEE (H. REPT. NO. 1269).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report from the joint subcommittee on Interstate Commerce to the Senate and House of Representatives, which was ordered printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 9, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for the transfer of the Government exhibit, or such portion thereof as the President may determine is advisable, now at the Panama-California International Exposition, at San Diego, Cal., to the Mississippi Centennial Exposition, at Gulfport, Miss. (H. Doc. No. 1889); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an item for inclusion in the general deficiency bill under the title of appropriation, "Expenses of Indian commissioners," fiscal years 1914 and 1915 (H. Doc. No. 1890); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting two items for inclusion in the general deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 1891); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Labor submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for rent, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 1892); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Sacramento River, Cal., from Chico Landing to Red Bluff (H. Doc. No. 1893); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of Commerce submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce for repairing and overhauling the steamer Fish Hawk (H. Doc. No. 1894); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending amendment of estimate submitted for contingent expenses, Independent Treasury, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1895); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1896); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending that an item of $75,000 be included in the general deficiency bill for contingent expenses, Independent Treasury, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 1897); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

10. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting estimates of additional deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1917 (H. Doc. No. 1898); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNING: A bill (H.
